THE MADRIGAL SOCIETY offers Two Prizes, being the "Molineux Prize" of Ten Pounds, and the "Society's Prize" of Five Pounds, for the best and second best APPROVED MADRIGALS in not less than four nor more than six parts, the upper part or parts to be for one or two Treble Voices. The character of the composition to be after the manner of the Madrigal of the 17th century, by Benet, Wilbye, Weelkes, Marenzio, and others, and to consist of independent part-writing, in figure or imitation; therefore a mere part-song or melody harmonised will be inadmissible.

The Madrigals to be delivered, addressed to the Secretary of the Madrigal Society, Woodside, Caterham, Surrey, on or before September 15, 1885, each composition having a device or motto affixed thereto, with the composer's name in a sealed envelope bearing a corresponding mark.

thereto, with the composer corresponding mark.

The award of the judges will be made known at the first meeting of the Society for the ensuing season, in November, 1885.

IMPORTANT ANNOUNCEMENT.

THE MUSICAL TIMES

AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR

EDITED BY H. C. LUNN.

PUBLISHED ON THE FIRST OF EVERY MONTH.

When in the number of "THE MUSICAL TIMES" for December, 1876, we intimated to our readers that, in consequence of the large demands upon our space, the Proprietors had resolved, at the commencement of the following year, to increase the Journal to 48 pages, it could scarcely be foreseen that the new features of interest then introduced would constantly necessitate a still further increase. The pressure of highly important matter has however for several years rendered this course of action absolutely indispensable, and numbers have frequently appeared consisting of 64 pages. In order, therefore, to fully maintain the character of the journal, not only as a reliable record of all events in the world of music, but as a vehicle for the expression of the opinions of cultivated thinkers on the art, it has been resolved to ENLARGE ITS SIZE PERMANENTLY TO 64 PAGES, beginning with the present number. That the promises made in our former announcement have been faithfully fulfilled must be frankly acknowledged; and we have now only to add that every exertion will still be made to strengthen our fournal, not only by increasing the number of special correspondents, both at home and abroad, but by securing from time to time the services of the ablest writers as regular contributors.

On and after JANUARY 1, 1885, the Price of the Journal will be raised from 3d. to 4d.; post-free, 5d.; Annual Subscription, 5s. The musical composition published in each number, when purchased separately, will, however, be sold, as before, at 11d.

THE MUSICAL TIMES

AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.

THE COMING YEAR.

STANDING upon the threshold of a new year, it may be well to attempt some kind of forecast of its musical probabilities. Though not without features of interest, 1884 will hardly as a whole be ranked among the most eventful of recent years; if compared with some of its predecessors it might almost be called quiet. It is only natural that in art, as in nature, periods of activity should be alternated with seasons of lull and repose. So far as can be foreseen, the coming year bids fair to be one of more than average interest; and we propose briefly to notice the chief events which may be anticipated in the musical world, both metropolitan and provincial.

As the year 1885 is the bi-centenary of the births of both Handel and Bach, it may, of course, be anticipated that the works of these composers should attract of Handel's works than any other musical institu-tion, announces a performance of "Belshazzar" on February 27. This will certainly be most welcome; help asking, in passing, why out of nineteen oratorios which Handel wrote not more than three or four are to be heard except on the rarest occasions? "Saul, "Athalia," "Joshua," "Belshazzar," and others which might be named, are quite as well worthy of a hearing as "Samson" or "Judas Maccabæus" they appear to be persistently ignored. Let us hope that the performance of "Belshazzar" may direct the attention of our musical societies to the neglected treasures to be found in the complete edition of Handel's works.

The Crystal Palace Company is exercising a very wise discretion in anticipating by one year the triennial Handel Festival, which is fixed for the coming June, instead of June 1886. No specific announce-ment of the programmes has yet been made; but it may be safely conjectured that the "Messiah" and "Israel in Egypt" will occupy the first and third days of the festival, and that the only novelties introduced will be on the Selection day. Even on this point too much must not be expected; as past experience leads to the conclusion that there are certain stereotyped numbers, both solos and choruses, which are sure to be given at every festival. The performances will of course be conducted by Mr. Manns, whose success on the last occasion is sufficient guarantee that the coming celebration will be in musical efficiency by no means inferior to those that have preceded it.

The 21st of March being the 200th anniversary of Bach's birthday, the Bach choir will give a grand performance in the Albert Hall of the great Mass in B minor, a work of which in this country the society which Mr. Otto Goldschmidt conducts appears to enjoy the monopoly. For this occasion there will be a chorus of about 600 voices, the Bach choir forming the nucleus; and we presume that the orchestra will be proportionately reinforced. Under such conditions the undertaking is formidable; because Bach's complex and exceedingly florid counterpoint is less fitted for a large body of performers than the simple and more diatonic progressions of Handel; but our recollection of the excellent performances given some years since of the "Christmas Oratorio" and the "Passion according to St. Matthew" by the Albert Hall Choral Society reminds us that the difficulties of the task, though great, are not insuperable: and Mr. Goldschmidt may be safely trusted to neglect no means towards securing a satisfactory result.

Leaving these special performances, and coming to our established musical institutions, the Crystal Palace naturally claims the first place. The Saturday concerts are to be resumed, after the usual Christmas interval, on February 14. The full programmes of the remaining concerts are not yet issued; but the promises of the original prospectus which have not yet been fulfilled give evidence that there will be no lack of attractiveness at Sydenham during the rest of the season. Berlioz's "Te Deum," which has never yet been heard in England, will of course be the work which will excite the greatest interest; but the production of Raff's last symphony, and of Brahms's new symphony, if the latter work should be ready in time, will also give importance to the coming concerts.

The Philharmonic Society has just issued its pre-liminary prospectus, and enough is known of its special attention during the coming season. The probable plans to justify anticipations of a successful Sacred Harmonic Society, which in the past has season. In the first place, the committee has aban-probably done more to spread a knowledge and love doned the policy pursued last year of engaging a different conductor for each concert, and have secured the services for the season of Sir Arthur Sullivan. This is a distinct gain; for under an ever-varying direction for the opportunities of hearing the work—one of the highest artistic excellence is obviously impossible. the old master's finest-are very few. We cannot The question whether the committee has behaved well to those gentlemen who assisted them last season by conducting, in not inviting any one of them to accept the permanent conductorship, is a question which it is not our business now to discuss. Among the promised novelties of the season are a new symphony, composed for the Society and conducted by Herr Dvorák; Moszkowski's symphonic poem "Johanna d'Arc," produced for the first time in England, and also conducted by the composer; a new orchestral serenade, composed and conducted by Mr. Thomas Wingham, and a new Prize Overture, the committee having offered a prize of twenty guineas for the best composition in this form. If the Directors of the Philharmonic Society cannot command success, they are at least doing their best to deserve it. The Richter concerts, which have now apparently become an established institution among us, will be given as usual after Easter; but as no prospectus has vet been published, we are unable to furnish particulars concerning them. Looking at past seasons, it is at least a reasonable conjecture that the symphonies of Beethoven and extracts from the works of Wagner will be the attractions upon which reliance will mostly be placed.

The London Musical Society has since its foundation six years ago made for itself a special reputation by the performance of novelties. The two concerts to be given during the year will show no falling off in research, or in interest, as they will include Rheinberger's cantata "Christoforus," a work of which report speaks very highly, the "Sänger's Fluch" of Schumann, the "Requiem" of Draeseke, and the orchestral "Legenden" of Dvorák, all for the first time in England. Lovers of part-singing will have heard with much pleasure of the intention of Mr. Henry Leslie to resume the direction of his celbrated choir. We can wish him nothing better than that he may soon restore it to the proud position which it occupied for so many years as the finest body of unaccompanied singers to be heard in the metropolis.

Looking now in the direction of opera, the prospect in one direction is very bright. Every lover of true art will be glad to hear that Mr. Carl Rosa will this year give a nine weeks' season of English opera in London, instead of the very short seasons which we have had of recent years. The past career of Mr. Rosa warrants the confident anticipation that the performances will be of high excellence. The special features of the coming season will be the production of a new opera on a Russian subject by Mr. A. Goring Thomas, and the first performance in London of Massenet's new opera "Manon," the English version of which is from the experienced pen of Mr. Joseph Bennett. Of Italian and German opera nothing positive can yet be said. The increasingly exorbitant demands of prime donne make the successful carrying on of Italian opera a more and more difficult task-a matter which from an art point of view is not wholly a cause for regret. If Italian opera is to be popularised among us, and its masterpieces deserve popularity as much as those of the French and German schools, this can only be effected by the entire abandonment of the pernicious "star-system," and the substitution for it of that excellence of ensemble to which Mr. Carl Rosa on the one side, and the German opera performances at Drury Lane and Covent Garden on the other, chiefly owe their success. Nothing is yet settled as to a German opera season this year; on the other hand, there have been rumours, though at present nothing more, of possible performances of French opéra comique" at one of our metropolitan theatres.

In the International Inventions Exhibition, to be join us in the wish that the year 1885 held during the present year at South Kensington, distinct artistic progress in the country.

we regret to find that music is relegated to a subordinate place. It is true that the exhibits are classified in two divisions, "Inventions" and "Music"; but an examination of the official prospectus shows that while the former division contains thirty-one groups, the musical department has only three; it is, so to speak, tacked on as a kind of appendage to the other. It is probably too late now for the Commissioners to modify their scheme to any considerable extent; but, as recent exhibitions have had a distinctly educational aim, we would, even now, suggest the possibility of giving more importance to the musical section of the coming one. With the resources at their disposal a series of historical performances of music might be feasible. We learn that a series of choral competitions is contemplated; but experience unfortunately teaches that such meetings are seldom successful, if only for the reason that first-class choirs with an established reputation decline to enter upon contests in which they have little or nothing to gain, and in the event of defeat (possibly by no fault of their own,) a great deal to lose. In any case, it is a slight, rather than an honour, to the art to introduce it, as has apparently been done, as a kind of make-weight; and in the name of English musicians we feel it our duty to protest against the course which the Commissioners have thought proper to adopt.

Of the three provincial festivals of the year that of Birmingham will, as usual, occupy the post of honour. Three years since the committee showed itself fully alive to the responsibilities of its position; and the festival at which Gounod's "Redemption, Gade's "Psyche," Mr. Villiers Stanford's Serenade, and other works from English pens were produced, was in all respects one of the most successful ever held. There is every prospect that the festival which will take place next August will fully equal the last. Gounod's sequel to the "Redemption"—his new oratorio "Mors et Vita"—will, of course, be the greatest attraction; but besides this, Dvorák is writing a new cantata for the occasion. English music too will be excellently represented; in the vocal department there will be choral works by Messrs. Cowen, Stanford, and Anderton; and in the instrumental Mr. Ebenezer Prout will contribute a symphony, and Mr. A. C. Mackenzie a violin concerto. The name of Hans Richter as conductor is in itself a tower of strength; and it may be safely predicted that the festival will be the prominent event of the musical year. Of the two other festivals, that of the Three Choirs at Hereford and that at Bristol, very little can yet be said, because the arrangements are not sufficiently advanced; but from the former city we hear that a statement recently made in the columns of Truth, to the effect that the festival would not take place for want of proper support, has excited so much feeling in the neighbourhood that stewards have already come forward as guarantors against loss in far larger numbers than at the last festival. There is a talk of a performance of Liszt's "St. Elizabeth" at Bristol; but we believe nothing is yet definitely settled.

From the necessarily incomplete list of coming events which we have given in this article, it will be seen that the musical year bids fair to be anything but dull. It is probable that many features of interest will present themselves of which at present nothing is known; but the arrangements already made are sufficient to justify a sanguine view of the future. Signs of vigorous life are everywhere apparent, in the smaller provincial centres no less than in the metropolis; and all lovers of music will join us in the wish that the year 1885 may show a distinct artistic progress in the country.

HANDEL MYTHS By WILLIAM H. CUMMINGS.

THE bi-centenary of the birth of G. F. Handel is almost at hand. Biographies of him are so numerous and accessible that it is unnecessary to give even a summary of his instructive and interesting career, but it will be useful to endeavour to dissipate some of the fond imaginings of enthusiastic Handelians, which by frequent repetition have at last come to be regarded as absolute truth. How often we read in the daily and other journals of pilgrimages to "Handel's Church," at Whitchurch, near Edgware; what enthusiasm is excited in the breast of the admiring visitor to the sacred fane when he reads the organ-case:

"HANDEL was Organist of this Church from the year 1715 to 1721, and composed his oratorio Esther on this Organ."

Of course, a musician, amateur or professional, recollecting the well authenticated accounts of Handel's method of composing "da mente," knows that the inscription cannot be accepted as literally true, he therefore substitutes the word "performed" for "composed," and feels happy in believing that, at least, he is actually visiting the church where Handel was organist. A recent writer, more bold than his predecessors, said "Handel composed his oratorio" Esther" for the consecration of this church. In fact, it was perhaps literally within these walls that Handel's career was decided." This is all fable, arising from the generally accepted belief that the church referred to was once the chapel of the Duke of Chandos.

Schælcher, in his life of Handel, adopted the error, and still more recently Mr. Rockstro, in his excellent biography of the great master, has fallen into a similar mistake. At page 104, speaking of the Duke of Chandos's chapel, at Cannons, he says: "For the service in his private chapel he maintained not only a numerous choir, but a band of instrumental performers also, on a scale as grand as that of a Kapelle of a German potentate. This chapel—now the parish church of Whitchurch, Middlesex—is the only building on the estate which has escaped destruction."

The mistake so oft-repeated seems to have originated by a statement of Lysons in his book, "Environs of London" (Vol. III., p. 408), where he says, "The Parish Church is dedicated to St. Lawrance. It was rebuilt (the tower excepted) at the expense of the Duke of Chandos, about the year 1715, but the internal decorations were not finished till 1720. It was opened on the 29th of August of that year." Lysons gives as his authority Reed's Weekly Journal, but that paper, under date September 3, 1720, says, "His Grace the Duke of Chandos's domestic chapel at his seat at Cannons, Edgware, curiously adorned with paintings on the windows and ceilings, had divine worship performed in it, with an anthem, on Monday last, the first time of its being opened."

This account most clearly points out the fact that it was the domestic or private chapel which was opened in 1720. It remains for me to prove that the domestic chapel and the Parish Church were co-existent, but distinct buildings. Fortunately we are enabled to do this by referring to a work entitled, "A Journey through England in Familiar Letters from a Gentleman Here to his Friend Abroad," published in 1724. the furniture and effects of the mansion were sold Speaking of the Duke of Chandos's estate at Cannons, and the building demolished. Cock, the well-known he says, "The disposition of the avenues, gardens, statues, paintings, and the house of Cannons, suits the genius and grandeur of its great master. The the genius and grandeur of its great master. The auction. One of the lots in the catalogue was the Chapel, which is already finished, hath a choir of "fine-toned organ by Jordan." This organ is now and when his grace goes to Church, he is attended by his Swiss guards, ranged as the yeomen of the guard: his musick also plays when he is at table; he is served by gentlemen in the best order; and I must say that few German sovereign princes live with that magnificence, grandeur, and good order . . . You ascend the great avenue to Cannons from the town of Edger by a fine iron gate, with the duke's arms and supporters on the stone pillars of the gate, with balustrades of iron on each side, and two neat lodges on the inside. This avenue is near a mile long, and three coaches may go abreast. In the middle or half-way of this avenue is a large round bason of water, not unlike that on the great road through Bushey Park to Hampton Court. the following, inscribed on a brass plate attached to avenue fronts an angle of the house, showing you two fronts at once, and makes the house seen at a distance the larger. . . . You turn, therefore, a little to the left to come to the great court, which leads to the salon and the great staircase, and a little further to the left to another court, which leads tothe back stairs, now made use of till the great apartments are finished. The house consists of four fronts, all of free stone, of about a hundred feet wide each. The front from the great stairs is to the east, and hath an avenue directly from it down to the Parish Church at about half-a-mile's distance. The north front is towards the parterre and great canal; the west towards the gardens; and the south looks through a great area, where the offices and stables are, down another large avenue which ends in a mountain. . . The salon, when finished, is to be supported by marble pillars and painted by Belluci, as is the great staircase, which is all of marble; most of the steps are already laid, and of great length, and all one piece of marble. The staircase leads you into the apartments fronting the parterre and grand canal, and consists of a suite of six noble rooms, well proportioned, finely plastered and gilt by Paragotti, and the ceilings painted by Belluci. From these apartments you go into my lord's dressing-room and library, fronting the gardens, and from thence you descend by another fine pair of stairs (which I cannot call backstairs), all painted by Legarr, and balustraded to the top of the house by iron into a court which opens into the great area to the East, in which is the Chapel on your right, the kitchen on your left, and lower on each side the stables, the bottom of the area enclosed with balustrades of iron. . . . The chapel is incomparably neat, and finely plastered and gilt by Paragotti, and the ceilings and niches painted by Belluci. There is a handsome altar-piece, and in an alcove above the altar, a neat organ. Fronting the altar, above the gate, is a fine gallery for the duke and duchess, with a door that comes from the apartments above, and a staircase that also descends into the body of the chapel, in case of taking the Sacrament, or other occasion. In the windows of this chapel are also finely painted some parts of the history of the New Testament.

This lengthy extract effectually establishes the distinct identity and locality of the domestic chapel and the parish church.

The Duke of Chandos died on August 9, 1744, and his heir, finding his patrimony insufficient to maintain an expensive estate like Cannons, endeavoured in vain to find a purchaser for the mansion; ultimately auctioneer of the Piazza, Covent Garden, sold the various items, including the building materials, by vocal and instrumental musick as the Royal Chapel; in Trinity Church, Gosport. It presents the same appearance it did in its original position at Cannons, mass of mediocrity by their side; but in addition to the fine case being decorated with the Chandos arms. It was purchased by a subscription of the parishioners. A document printed in 1748, giving an account of the purchase, is worthy of re-production here:-

117 12 0 To do.—ditto for repairs It will be interesting to note that the windows of the domestic chapel were purchased for the parish of Great Malvern, Worcestershire.

The Parish Church (Whitchurch) was rebuilt by the Duke of Chandos simultaneously with the erection of his own mansion, the paintings and decorations were by the artists Paragotti, Belluci, and Legarr. The Duke intended to rebuild a tower also, but "the parishioners having sold their bells in the expectation that the Duke would present them with a new peal, his Grace took offence and proceeded no further in his design."

The brass plate, which lies so circumstantially, was placed on the organ-case by Julius Plumer, Esq. M. Schælcher notices the fact, and adds the date, 1750, an evident mistake; the estate of Cannons was purchased in 1811 by Sir Thomas Plumer, Vice-Chancellor of England, and the donor of the plate was his son.

Handel resided in London from 1715 to 1720; he became chapel-master and director of music to the Earl of Carnarvon (afterward Duke of Chandos) in 1718, who then resided in Cavendish Square. It is not probable that Handel visited Cannons until he went there in 1720 to produce his Oratorio "Esther" for his patron, who had been created Duke of Chandos in April, 1719. The Parish Church of Whitchurch is interesting from its association with the Grand Duke, as he was called; and Handel may have visited the Church and probably performed on the organ, but it is certain that he never was organist of the church, nor did he compose on the organ therein.

THE GROWTH OF MUSICAL FESTIVALS.

This heading may seem a little curious, not to say unmeaning, as the number of our provincial musical gatherings has for some time past exhibited little or no tendency to increase. It has often been a matter of surprise to us that the long-continued existence and prosperity of triennial festivals in certain towns has not led to wholesale imitation in other centres of population. Putting art on one side for the moment, and regarding only utilitarian considerations, the benefit of periodic music meetings is undeniable. The local charities of Birmingham and Leeds, and of Gloucester, Worcester, and Hereford, are enriched to no small extent by this means; and the presence of a large number of well-to-do visitors must be of great service to local traders and hotel-keepers. service these gatherings render to music is no less real and unquestionable. As we pointed out last month, it is only at provincial festivals that new works of importance are commissioned and produced in this country. The loss to art if Birmingham had not acted as a motive power for the presentation of "Elijah" to the world would have been incalculable. And only recently the awakening of Norwich to a sense of its duties in the matter has been the means of giving us "The Rose of Sharon." The production About this there ought to be no doubt whatever. of two such works would alone compensate for a If the former recognise the power for edification of them, scores of lesser works could be named which are now in the répertoire of choral societies, and give pleasure to thousands, but which would have had no existence but for the initiative of festival committees. It is especially astonishing that up to the present time no cathedral cities have followed the example set by the three western shires. the governing bodies of our cathedrals we have the nucleus of festival machinery ready to hand, and local support might be regarded as certain to follow any movement set on foot by the leading clerical authorities of a diocese. We are fully aware that substantial, and by no means ill-founded, objections to the use of cathedrals for elaborate musical performances were made a few years ago, owing to the increased feelings of reverence for sacred buildings, and the existence of certain abuses for which the management and the public were equally responsible. How these objections have been met and conquered by mutual displays of good sense and good taste is well known to musicians. Simultaneously, a conviction has been steadily gaining ground that secular concert-rooms are not the most appropriate places for the rendering of grand sacred works. Is there any one bold enough to deny that "The Messiah," "Elijah," and "The Redemption" are immeasurably more impressive when heard in a cathedral, with its solemn beauty and aweinspiring associations, than in St. James's Hall, amid garish lights, the buzz of conversation, and the interruption of applause? English cathedrals were for centuries the nurseries of national musical art in this country, and the time has now arrived when they can be so in a larger and more comprehensive sense, at the same time making music fulfil its best and truest mission, that of being the hand-

We look from Dan to Beersheba and happily find that all is not barren. Information reaches us that a movement has been started for the establishment of a triennial festival in Lincoln. A more appropriate centre for such an institution could not be named. With the exception of the Norwich festival there are no musical gatherings of importance in the Eastern counties, and, whether justly or not, this part of the country has incurred the stigma of being unmusical. The reproach could not be more easily wiped out than by inaugurating a festival scheme analagous to that of the Three Choirs. Norwich, Lincoln, and Peterborough might be the centres of operation, and the preliminaries now taking place in the capital of the fen country may therefore be regarded as a step in the right direction. It appears that a similar idea was entertained about twenty years ago, but it However, we have advanced proved abortive. greatly since that time, and things are now fairly promising. In order, first of all, to enlist the sympathy and support of existing musical bodies in the county, a meeting of representatives of these bodies was held on November 28, when the matter was discussed and the idea of forming a "Musical Festival Association," each society to furnish a contingent, cordially approved. It appears that there are eight choral societies, with an approximate total of 820 members. By selecting about 300 of these and engaging a small body of trained choralists from Yorkshire, it is thought that a festival choir could be formed capable of efficiently interpreting the most elaborate works. The next step will be to win the unanimous approval of the cathedral authorities and the pecuniary and moral support of the most influential personages in the county.

sacred musical masterpieces—and as men of culture they cannot deny the same-and if the latter realise how much it is possible to achieve for art at a trifling monetary sacrifice, they will unite at once in furthering a scheme which cannot fail to benefit alike religion, art, and charity. The last named consideration will, no doubt, have very great weight with many of those whose help must be sought in the undertaking. Some day the claims of music to support on its own account, and quite apart from questions of philanthropy, will be admitted by all educated persons. On the one hand, the charitable institutions of the country ought to receive sufficient sustenance without bribes to the wealthy in the form of concert tickets, and, on the other, the love of art should be so general that there should be no necessity to urge the public to listen to the finest oratorios on the ground that by so doing they would benefit the sick and the poor. If it be absolutely necessary to combine festival-giving with charity, it proves that as a nation we are not yet sufficiently benevolent nor sufficiently musical. However, it is useless to indulge in longings for the millenium. The facts must be faced, and at any rate it will be better to have a festival under the usual conditions than no festival at all. In order to form a rough idea of the probable financial outcome of the undertaking, an estimate has been drawn up, based on the result of the Wolverhampton meeting in 1883. From this it appears that after paying the expenses of two Oratorio performances in the Cathedral, and two secular concerts in the Corn Exchange, a balance may be anticipated on the right side of £276. This does not seem an extravagant expectation, but at the same time it would be necessary to provide for any possible loss by the formation of a guarantee fund, and a proposal of this kind would at once test the feeling of the district. The Nottingham press has pronounced in favour of the scheme, and the idea has been mooted to make the festival an annual affair, to be held alternately in Lincoln, Nottingham, and Leicester. All that now remains is to wish the labourers in the cause Godspeed in their good work, and to express the hope that before long the glorious Minster of Lincoln may resound with the inspired harmonies of Handel, Mendelssohn, and other revered masters.

THE MUSIC OF THE PEOPLE

By F. CORDER.

AFTER an absence of twenty-five years I returned to England in September last, and naturally one of my first enquiries was about the progress of music in my native land during that long period, for no news of the outer world had ever reached me in those wild regions of Chinese Tartary from which I had at last escaped. My old friend and former fellow-student, Optimus Smith, whose cordial welcome home and generous hospitality had so rejoiced my heart, gave me the most glowing accounts of the increase of the love of music among the English; according to him a perfect transformation had occurred. On the other hand, my cousin, Pessimus Brown, who was of a somewhat cold and unenthusiastic disposition, took a much less favourable view of the present state of things.

"Why," said Optimus, "in your time good music was hardly known. The Crystal Palace Concerts and Monday Pops. had only just started; there was nothing but the Philharmonic, the Musical Union, and a few private Concerts. Now-a-days there is good music heard everywhere and by everyone. Italian and English Opera, Oratorio performances in plenty, Promenade Concerts for the masses—oh, no end of things."

"As for that," said Pessimus, "twenty-five years ago all these things existed. Italian Opera was more fashionable then than now; English Opera was unfashionable, poorly done and poorly supported, as it is now, and Concert-giving was not a bit more precarious an undertaking."

"But you cannot deny," urged Optimus, "that there is twice as much good music in London now as there was then."

"Twice as much," I remarked, "would not argue any advance in public taste, since you tell me that the population of this huge city has more than doubled in that period."

"You have hit it," replied Pessimus. "If returns could be made of the number of persons attending performances of good music, I dare swear that the percentage would be found to be no greater now than ever it was."

"That I emphatically deny!" cried Optimus.

"As your assertion is incapable of proof," said I, "let us turn to another point. What about the people? I mean the three-fourths of the population—say, nearly four millions of souls in London and its environs—who do not frequent the opera and the other musical institutions just spoken of. I seem to remember some talk of Music for the People before I left England. There were to be, or perhaps actually were, places where they could take their suppers and at the same time listen to good but light music. How did that scheme answer?"

Smith looked somewhat disconcerted at this question, but Brown grinned.

"If," said the latter, "you want to know about the musical food of the million, you can soon be instructed. Sir George Grove's Dictionary has no article upon the subject; everyone is silent about it for very shame, I hope. But go where you will and behold the British public enjoying itself, and there also will you behold that artistic disgrace of our country—the vulgar, the degrading, the hopelessly idiotic institution of the music-hall."

"Dear me!" I said; "is it so bad as all that?"

"Words entirely fail to describe its badness; but this is not all. Like a devouring monster, it is swallowing up all other forms of less objectionable amusement. Everything is tainted with it, every year it grows more and more into public favour. Formerly the higher classes shrank from its vulgarity, if not from its inanity, now aristocrats and plebeians alike succumb to its charm, and the variety entertainment is paramount everywhere."

"Enough," said I. "If this be so we have the strangest of strange phenomena to investigate. I will search into this matter myself, without prejudice, and publish the result. I know full well that the majority of those who go to classical Concerts neither understand nor appreciate a note of what they hear; let me now see for myself what form of musical entertainment is really enjoyed by my fellow country-

I immediately proceeded to set about my self-appointed task. Reader, do you already pity me? Methinks I behold a tear of sympathy in the eye of every true-hearted musician. I accept the tender tribute, and respond in kind. But, tush! this is unmanly. Away with weakness till my tale is told.

With a still vivid remembrance of the admirable burlesques, by Brough and Byron, which used to cause the Strand and Olympic theatres to be so thronged in the days of Bedford, Turner, and Robson, I sought a theatre where burlesque was a specialty. There were several. I chose one hap-hazard, and there passed an evening, the memory of which will stay like a hideous nightmare with me till I die. Having been so long away from England I could not, of course, be expected to enter into the humour of the piece; that it had humour was evident from the extreme delight of the audience. But at least I might claim to judge the music, which, both vocal and instrumental, was of a degree of atrociousness beyond all description. Yet it was the musical portion of the entertainment which especially charmed the listeners, who applauded the yelping, howling crew to the echo. Expressing my surprise and disgust to my friends, Smith and Brown, I was ironically advised by the latter to go and hear an opera-bouffe. I did go. The piece had a French name, which I wondered at, for it was difficult to pronounce, and might just as well have been translated as the rest was. But the performance! Oh, my sainted mother-the performance! I came away at the end of the first act, so I cannot tell the plot, if there was any. But the chorus consisted of twelve smirking young persons, who seemed too conscious of the amount of bare limb they were displaying to be able to sing, three tenors and four basses, with voices worn threadbare with shouting. The band, for economical reasons, consisted only of such instruments as could produce most noise for the money expended. I only heard a piccolo, a double-bass, a drum, and a euphonium; but there may have been a few others. The chief members of the company were a good low comedian, who had nothing to sing, an old man who repeated an irritating catch-word till he nearly made me cry, a throaty tenor who couldn't act, and a fascinating young person, who could do nothing but look at her many friends in front, and fling them bewitching glances. To crown all, the piece wasn't even worth doing well, for the music had apparently been put together out of a few old sets of quadrilles, and scored by the conductor of a provincial theatre band.

Next I sought a lower level and a still more popular style of entertainment: I went the round of the music halls. I dare not trust myself yet to speak of what I saw and heard there, enough that I was only too clearly convinced that this was the musical food which our masses truly loved and enjoyed, not because they could get no better, but because it was most suited to their intelligence-to their minds, in fact, if I may venture to use such an expression. I also understood now what Pessimus Brown had said about music-hall entertainments pervading and replacing all others, for both the burlesque and the opera-bouffe, which I had lately seen, were little else but variety entertainments in disguise. I now ceased to wonder or feel any kind of emotion at the musical atrocities which I daily came across, and pursued my task with the doggedness of a Stoic philosopher, whom nothing could pain or shock. But after concluding my three weeks' round of investigation by attending a Salvation Army service, I felt the next morning that even a constitution inured to hardship by a quarter of a century spent in central Asiatic travel could not stand against the terrible trials to which I had lately been subjecting myself. My health was seriously injured. I was ordered to the seaside by my physician, and naturally sought the most cheerful and invigorating of our southcoast resorts. Alas, it was out of the frying-pan into the fire! I enquired of my landlord whether there was any music going on, as this was the fashionable

"Oh dear, yes!" he replied, "There's some Concert or another nearly every night, there's a band on the lawns, another on the pier, and another on the rink, besides the Winter Garden and the town band and all. Oh, yes, plenty of music." And he was right. As this was a fashionable watering place I flattered myself that here at least I should escape the music-

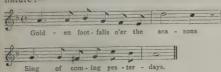

over the town forced upon the most reluctant mind complete information as to the unparalleled Variety entertainments at the Winter Garden, but worse than this was to behold the aristocratic assemblage upon the pier of an afternoon gloating over the lowest music-hall entertainment which the enterprising proprietor gave there gratis daily for an advertisement. It was at this time too that I discovered that there is one form of Variety far more dearly beloved than the others, this is the Nigger business. The nigger business simply consists in blackening the face with burnt cork and in singing music-hall songs to the accompaniment of a banjo, fiddle, and bones, and between the pieces asking ancient conundrums. There were four or five sets of niggers in the town where I was staying, and all, from morning till night, were surrounded by eager crowds. In the evenings they performed at the hotels to enliven the dinners of the more distinguished visitors, ave, even members of royal families, and if the pecuniary reward of these men was at all proportionate to the interest they aroused, their summer holiday must have been a delightful one. Day and night my ears were perpetually assailed by the clacking sound of the bones, until at last, finding that my health was not likely to improve under these circumstances, I returned to London resolved upon a heroic remedy. I knew, of course, that these niggers were the outcome of a singular and rather interesting form of entertainment which had been inaugurated before I left England. This consisted in a mimetic reproduction of the songs of the American plantation negroes in the original dialect. I therefore resolved to pay a visit to this performance and see whether, after more than twenty years' continuance, it still retained any of the quaint charm which characterised it of yore. found that there were two or three "oldest estab-lished Christys," each of which had performed unceasingly for nearly a whole generation. Could anything testify to their popularity better than this fact? Men may come and men may go, empires may rise and fall, but the Christys go on for ever; but not unchanged.

In spite of there being two performances daily, and this being a slack time of the year, I made my way with difficulty into the room, which was crowded to suffocation. Here, at least, I will not shrink from my duty, but narrate calmly and dispassionately what I saw and heard. There was a body of some thirty men, all in evening dress and with blackened faces. I am told that once a year, on Ash Wednesday, they go into mourning by washing their faces (like certain tribes in the east), and that if the burnt cork were dispensed with at any other time their influence over the public would be gone. Well, the instrumental portion of the troupe was as follows:-two fiddles and a cello, a flute, a cornet, a harp, and a big drum and cymbals, to which were added ten pairs of bones and six tambourines. Imagine, if you can, the effect of any orchestral piece whatever played by such a collection of instruments. But no one could who had not heard it. A few odd periods from one of Auber's best known overtures were strung together, and this prelude, though it lasted but a minute and a half, socompletely deafened me that I could hardly catch a word of the first two songs. One was a tenor ballad, which seemed very touching, every fourth line ended with the word "mother," which was brought out with a jerk thus-"moth-a-ar," and affected the bystanders profoundly; indeed, I saw one poor woman in tears, and was sorry to think that she should have perhaps her most sacred feelings stirred by so coarse a touch. After each verse the chorus sang the air harmonised (not over correctly), without accompaniment, the last halls, but vain was the hope. Flaming posters all time in a whisper, which was a very pretty effect, till it became silly. I soon discovered that there were only two kinds of songs; the sentimental, with whispered chorus, and the grotesque comic, with the full force of the percussion instruments. One of the former class I have just spoken of; a second (if my ears did not deceive me) ran like this :-

Golden footfalls o'er the seasons Sing of coming yesterdays,
While on many a sad to-morrow
Never more my heart shall gaze.

This pathetic composition was set to a melody of this nature :-

every succeeding four bars being of precisely the same rhythm.

But I never knew anything so powerfully affect an audience as the song called "Little Kitty's dead," over which men, women, and children positively sobbed. It seemed to me to go somewhat in this

The hearth is lonely now And all our eyes are red, I feel, I know not how, Since little Kitty's dead.

How peaceful and serene The night that once was dread Deep in the cistern green Lies little Kitty, dead.

After this it was necessary to revive the people's spirits, which was easily accomplished by some brilliant dialogue of the following pattern, between Pompey, a tambourine gentleman who spoke what was supposed to be negro dialect, and Mr. Johnson, the leader of the troupe, who spoke the most unnaturally elegant English:-

P. Say, Massa Johnson.
Mr. J. Well, Pompey, what have you to communicate?
P. Say, Massa Johnson, do you know?
Mr. J. Well, Pompey, do I know what?
P. Do you know as 'Ve left my lodgings?
Mr. J. Indeed, Pompey! What, those lodgings opposite, where you were so comfortable were so comfortable?

P. Hu—ugh! Not dem. I lef' dem ar lodgings fourteen year ago.

Mr. 3. Can that really be so, Pompey? So long a time ago and I to know nothing about it! That is very singular.

P. Not at all. Yah!

Mr. 3. Why not, pray?

P. 'Gos you was in gaol all de time! Yah, yah!

And at this exquisite retort, so artfully led up to, the audience screamed with laughter, their enjoyment being only increased when the joke was repeated again and again by other members of the troupe, leading the respectable Mr. Johnson into giving them openings for other accusations of a like offensive character. Then the "star," or principal performer, appeared and sang very gravely a nonsense song, consisting of a string of inconsequent absurdities so whimsical that I really laughed heartily at it. It was not generally appreciated, however. After this, seeing the audience rouse up in evident expectation of something unusually interesting, I glanced at my programme. Horror! The remainder of the entertainment consisted of clogdances, acrobatic feats, "comic acts"—in a word, of unadulterated music-hall or variety business. With horror in my soul I rose and fled, nor stayed my course till calmly overhead the golden stars upon my pathway shone, assisting reason to resume her throne. Yes, I felt as bad as that; and, hastening opinion from some of our readers (extracts from which home, sought refuge from my torments in the kindly appear elsewhere), while further correspondence in the Times shows that the subject is regarded with

I found it was done to nearly every song, after which seemed to me many hours, I only sank at last into an unrefreshing state of semi-unconsciousness, during which I was visited by a strange and terrible dream or nightmare.

I seemed to be projected into the dim future and to be repeating the events of the last few weeks-with a difference, however. It was twenty years hence, and I had again returned from the East. Again I was investigating the state of music in London, and suffering anguish in the task; but this time with still more reason. Music-hall reigned triumphant everywhere. From Sunday-School treats up to aristocratic fancy fairs, all was music-hall. The so-called pantomimes ran all the year round, and few were the theatres not given over to burlesque and opera-bouffe. I tried the new Shakespearian revival at the Lyceumit was the "Tempest," but so transformed by scenic effects, processions, ballets and comic interludes by music-hall artistes as to be unrecognisable. At another theatre there was a still greater attraction. A negro tragedian who twenty years ago had made his mark with a small part in a play called "Claudian," had vowed that there should come a time when he would play Othello as it had never been acted yet. He was now keeping his word, supported by a talented company of original Christys. He painted himself white for the part, having discovered this to be the poet's intention through an engraving in the first illustrated octavo edition of the play. At the Albert Hall was a monster circus and pantomime of "Mazeppa," while in the contiguous building an exhibition of all the latest inventions and improvements in variety entertainments was being held. A company of distinguished amateur niggers occupied St. James's Hall every Saturday, a royal Duke officiating with the bones as a "corner man." There was a Richter Concert one night, certainly; but on eagerly flying to it I found that the performers were fain to blacken their faces to secure any audience at all; Symphonies were only now played in single movements, one at each Concert, and that considerably cut and with extra parts for tambourines and bones written in. Topical songs were introduced as a relief, and the audience were encouraged to join in the chorus, words and music being given in the analytical programme. In despair I fled to the opera, where now none but Wagner's music was allowed to be performed. "Tannhäuser" was announced, but judge of my horror when I saw that the Venusberg scene represented a view of the Westminster Aquarium, and the Hall of Song was a faithful reproduction of St. James's Hall, the minstrel knights being Christy Minstrels! Nature could endure no more. With a cry of anguish I awoke, and as the pale light of a December morning met my eyes I heard a discordant wail in the street beneath :-

God rest you merry gentleman, May nothing you dismay.

The tune was tortured by being changed from minor to major, the voices were harsh and nasal, the words garbled; but no strain of Mozart's ever stole more gratefully on the thirsting ear than did the pitiful wreck of the sweet old carol.

"Here, take this," cried I, wildly flinging the contents of my pockets to the poor souls; "take this, and sing till ye drop from fatigue. Thank heaven, the people have still some music left."

THE article on orchestral concerts in London which appeared in the December number of THE MUSICAL TIMES has resulted in a voluntary expression of warm interest by musical amateurs. Some of the humiliating, to read of the favourable conditions prewriters make light of the difficulties which lie in the way, while others recognise them boldly, even at the risk of being considered pessimistic. Mr. J. C. Rodrigues evidently imagines that the only question to be considered is that of charges for admission, and he goes into figures to prove that if the prices asked and obtained at the Richter Concerts were reduced by nearly one-half, orchestral Concerts in St. James's Hall could still be made to yield a sufficient profit. But his calculations are based on the assumption that the room would be full or nearly so at every Concert, which, of course, is never the case even with the most popular enterprises, such as those of Messrs. Chappell or Boosey; and further he imagines that the public would readily pay the highest price for seats far beyond the twentieth row. We think those who have had practical experience in Concert-giving would have no diffi-culty in upsetting his too sanguine conclusions. Sir Edward Lee, the managing director of the new Albert Palace at Battersea, states that the Concert hall in this building will meet all requirements regarding size and accommodation of a large orchestra and audience, but we have yet to learn whether the difficulty of access which undoubtedly has injured the fortunes of the Albert Hall will not also be urged with reason against the institution on the Surrey side of the Thames. We trust with earnestness that it will not be so. Coming to our own correspondents, Mr. Burrell controverts the assertions that the Albert Hall is badly situated, and that it is too large for orchestral performances. With regard to the first point, there is something to be said in favour of his view. Experience has shown that, given a sufficient attraction, the public will attend in sufficient numbers to fill the vast building. This has been the case on several occasions already during the present season. But it is also a matter of common observation that audiences invariably begin to disperse not later than ten o'clock, proving that the locale is still awkwardly remote from the residences of those who are most steadfast in supporting musical entertainments. With regard to the other question, we fear that general opinion is somewhat adverse to Mr. Burrell. When Herr Richter conducted a Concert at the Albert Hall, about three years ago, it was acknowledged with painful unanimity that his orchestra was less effective than usual; and the remarks of Richard Wagner, though worthy of permanent record, are scarcely available as evidence in the present enquiry, inasmuch as they were given on the impulse of the moment before the master had had any practical experience of the hall whose magnificent proportions excited his admiration and artistic imaginings. Mr. Rumsey confines himself to one extremely pertinent point in the matter at issue, and however unflattering it may be to the amour propre of English musicians, there is too much reason to believe that he has hit the right nail on the head. The London musical public has become painfully fastidious, and no second-rate performances will, at the present time, meet with acceptance. In order to make orchestral Concerts remunerative under existing conditions, a conductor must be found in whom intelligent amateurs can place implicit confidence, and, according to Mr. Rumsey, there are only two musicians who can fulfil the necessary conditions. As neither of these is available for ordinary purposes, we are once more left to consider the question, whether a new Concert room, more commodious than St. James's Hall, and where lower prices can be charged, is not an absolute necessity in order to establish orchestral Concerts on a permanent vailing in musical Manchester and unmusical Bristol with respect to this all-important branch of musical labour. There remains the question how the want is to be supplied. We have among us a number of wealthy owners of landed property to whom it would be a trifling sacrifice to bestow some of their "unearned increment," to use J.S. Mill's term, in providing such a building. As a commercial undertaking it would doubtless prove remunerative in the end, but we do not wish to give prominence to this view of the matter. The country pays £70,000 for a picture, and no one grudges the money. Music alone among the arts is left unendowed, and what the State refuses might well be supplied by private liberality.

WE are so constantly receiving letters from perplexed students requesting to know why the notation of the minor scale should not be altered in accordance with modern ideas on the subject, that we cannot but think that a few suggestions from those who take real interest in the matter would be welcomed by our readers. As a rule, musicians are so conservative that it becomes a task of extreme difficulty to move them to adopt any reform which would materially affect the ideas which they have grown up with. In this particular case, however, those correspondents who urge upon us the necessity of reconsidering the method of writing the minor scale are only proposing that it shall appear rationally, instead of irrationally, to the eye, and in consonance with what a diatonic scale should be—that is, with the major seventh properly placed at the signature, instead of being absurdly written as an accidental. Sir George Macfarren, in his work on Counterpoint, says: "The long-established inaccurate signature of the minor form of a key is the remnant of the Modal system, wherein all the modes have the same signature, though every one may be transposed higher or lower with altered signature to adjust the position of tones and semitones. This system for ages held back the progress of music by obscuring, if not totally hiding, the natural principles on which music is based, and which constitute the science that furnishes the materials wherewith the artist works." These observations are followed by remarks upon the fallacy of mentally uniting a major key with its "relative" minor; and as we find that it is now the custom to put the tonic, and not the relative minor, side by side with a major scale for the practice of students, it will be seen that Sir George Mac-farren's theory is being acted upon. As B natural, for example, is admitted to be as much a portion of the scale of C minor as of C major, let this be proved by the signature; and if it be thought necessary to indicate the derivation of the scale from that of E flat major, place three flats at the commencement, with a natural after the B flat, to show that this note is raised to form our modern minor scale.

AT a recent Sunday Lecture by Professor Blackie, on the love-songs of Scotland, given at St. Andrew's Hall, Glasgow, he told his audience that although some people thought it profane to deliver such a discourse on Sunday, he was of opinion that what was said on week-days should be said on Sunday. Ministers opposed his speaking on love-songs and beautiful women; but clergymen usually sought for beautiful wives, especially with big purses. He liked to see a woman's beautiful face, but never looked at her ankles. "In railway coaches and other places," he said, "I see a number smoking what they call tobacco. Well, whatever may be said about that, it basis. It is decidedly unsatisfactory, not to say is not an intellectual or moral stimulant, and the flavour of it is not at all like the rose or any poetic thing I know. It is essentially a vulgar sort of amusement. My amusement is to sing songs. At spoken by those who have so thoroughly apprehome I am always singing Scotch songs; and abroad, when those wretches are smoking, I hum to myself 'Scots wha hae,' 'A man's a man for a' that,' and songs of that kind." He then advised his listeners to do the same, as "their souls," he informed them, would by this means become "singing birds, and the Devil won't get near them." The idea of turning a lecture on Scotch love-songs into a protest against the use of tobacco is, at least, an original one; but we know many persons not addicted to the use of the "noxious weed" who would infinitely prefer the company of one eternally smoking to that of one eternally singing, even were he to devote his talents exclusively to Scotch music. The admirable manner in which Professor Blackie has trained himself to look only at the "beautiful face" of a woman, of course entitles him to profound respect; but we cannot see that this noble act of self-restraint has anything whatever to do with a love for Scotch songs; nor are we inclined to look forward with much pleasure to the time when men shall endeavour to turn their souls into "singing birds," in order that the Devil may not get near them.

THE list of railway travellers' grievances seems unfortunately on the increase. Want of punctuality in the trains, incessant and distracting whistling, imperfectly lighted carriages, and a host of other miseries which call loudly for reform, are constantly detailed in the daily newspapers by long-suffering victims; and the culminating proof of bad management in the refreshment department has lately been recorded by a passenger who, luckily in time, discovered a rusty nail in his plate of soup. An evening contemporary now adds to our misfortunes by telling us in a paragraph, which ought to have appeared in the "Agony column," that " Pianoforte Saloons" are being constructed, for the convenience of those musically inclined on their journey. We have already given instances, from our own experience, of the coffeeroom of an hotel being converted into a practiceroom for young ladies who have left school for the holidays; and if, in addition to this, we are to have the sound of the pianoforte throughout our travels, it would be difficult to see where we are to go for that repose which even the most ardent musician desires sometimes. The paper which announces the melancholy fact upon which we have commented, asks whether "the Inland Revenue people will insist that a music license must be obtained." No doubt the "Revenue people" will be very glad of the money they may thus add to the exchequer; but in this instance, we think, it might be considered whether a license, if applied for, would be granted by the "people" who travel.

We are certain that our readers will feel interested in the fact of a letter having been addressed to a friend in this country by the composer Antonín Dvorák, written throughout in English. He frankly states that the penning of such an epistle "is connected with many difficulties"; but that, as his heart is with the English people, he must do his best in order to express his feelings of gratitude in their own language. The "many difficulties" the writer has had to contend with may be readily imagined when we say that on his recent visit to this country he could scarcely speak, and certainly not write, a word of English; and that his study of the language has been most diligently pursued is made evident not only by the by the comparative ease with which he constructs his sentences. To him the mastery of a language ciated his artistic works is evidently a labour of love, and faithfully reflects that earnestness and sincerity of purpose so eminently characteristic of all the compositions by which he has earned his world-wide fame.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

A SPLENDID performance of Schumann's "Rhenish" symphony, in E flat, commenced the Crystal Palace Saturday concert on November 29. Mr. Manns never appears to greater advantage than in conducting Schumann's music, and his orchestra has certainly never been in better form than during the present season, so far as it has yet gone. A new pianist, Herr Fritz Blumer, made his first appearance at Sydenham on the same afternoon, selecting for his début Saint-Saëns's showy and brilliant, but somewhat superficial, concerto in G minor. has been frequently heard in London, as well as at the Crystal Palace, and the reason why it is so often chosen by pianists is doubtless to be found in the brilliant opportunity for display which it affords to the executant rather than in its intrinsic musical merits. Herr Blumer's technical ability proved fully equal to all the demands made upon it, but the question as to his artistic position must be left undetermined until he is heard in some other work requiring higher qualities than mere fluency and power. The selections from Rubinstein's Ballet, "The Grape," which was the novelty of the afternoon, is in its composer's characteristic style, and very cleverly orchestrated. Mr. Joseph Maas was the vocalist at this concert, giving Gounod's "Salve dimora" and Massenet's scena, "Apollo's Invocation," composed for the recent Norwich Festival.

It is comparatively seldom that an opportunity is afforded of hearing Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony, either as a whole or in part; the performance, therefore, of the three most important instrumental movements from the work gave special interest to the concert on the 6th ult. Though, as a rule, selections from a symphony are to be deprecated, no objection can exist in the present instance; for not only are the practical difficulties in the way of a complete performance of the work very considerable, but the composer himself set the example of giving the instrumental portions of the work apart from the vocal. The three movements brought forward at the Crystal Palace were that entitled "Romeo seul, Tristesse, Bruit lointain de Bal et de Concert, Grande Fête chez Capulet," the "Scene d'Amour," and the "Queen Mab" Capitet, the Scene d'Aniout, and the Queen Man scherzo—unquestionably the most effective numbers for separate presentation. They were as a whole superbly rendered by the orchestra, and enthusiastically received by the audience. A new violinist—new, at least, at Syden-ham—made his first appearance at this concert. Herr Robert Heckmann, of Cologne, is well known in Germany, and his performance of the first (and better) of Bruch's two concertos for the violin proved that his reputation abroad was fully justified. His tone, execution, and style are alike good, and he at once established his position as a sound artist. The remaining orchestral numbers at this concert were the overtures to "Der Freischütz" and "Tannhäuser." Madame Patey was the vocalist.

The ninth concert of the season, on the 13th ult., was conducted, in the absence of Mr. Manns at Glasgow, by Mr. F. H. Cowen. The opportunity was naturally taken to bring before a Crystal Palace audience the conductor's latest important work, his symphony, No. 4, in B flat minor, first produced by the Philharmonic Society last May, and noticed at that time in some detail in our columns. A second hearing of this very interesting composition confirms the opinion expressed after its first performance; and we may, therefore, content ourselves now with recording an excellent rendering and a very warm reception. It would be well if more care were taken in the preparation of the book of the words of these concerts. The analysis of Mr. Cowen's symphony, which, if we mistake not, is the one written by Dr. Hueffer for the Philharmonic programme, was signed diligently pursued is made evident not only by the with the initials "F. H. C.," giving it a most egotistical excellent manner in which he spells the words, but appearance; and it commences with the following words:

"Mr. Cowen's new Symphony, produced at the Philhar-monic Concert of May 28th, 1884, and heard in Glasgow for the first time"—a ridiculous blunder, as it has not yet been given in Scotland, Doubtless, the analysis has been revised by its author for the coming Glasgow performance, and carelessly reprinted in the Crystal Palace book. The remaining orchestral numbers of this concert were Mr. Cowen's two unpretending little trifles, "Mélodie" and "A l'Espagnole," the overture to "Athalie," and Weber's "Invitation à la Valse," instrumented by Berlioz. The pianist of the afternoon was Herr Franz Rummel, who had not been heard at the Crystal Palace for more than two years. Among the younger generation of pianists Herr Rummel Among the younger generation of plants it for Ruminos occupies at distinguished place, not only as a great executant, but as an artist who is always heard with pleasure. His rendering of Schumann's Concerto and, later in the afternoon, of solos by Bach and Chopin was in all respects worthy of his reputation. Miss Mary Davies was the vocalist.

Gound's "Redemption" was given on the 20th ult. The solo vocalists were Mrs. Hutchinson, Miss M. Fenna, Miss H. Wilson, Mr. Barton McGuckin, Mr. F. King, and Mr. H. Pyatt, all of whom gave their music efficiently. The choruses were sung by the Crystal Palace choir with remarkable precision and effect. Mr. Manns conducted.

MONDAY AND SATURDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

It has been generally remarked that the programmes of the Saturday afternoon Concerts have been far more attractive of late than those of the Monday evenings, and the result has shown itself in audiences of singular disparity in point of numbers. For example, on Saturday, November 29, St. James's Hall was crowded, while on the 1st ult., it was not more than half full. On the first-named occasion the selection was certainly very enticing. Everything from the pen of Mr. A. C. Mackenzie now commands attention, and his Pianoforte Quartet in E flat possesses special interest, inasmuch as it was his first work ever heard in a London Concert-room. This was, if we remember rightly, in St. George's Hall, at one of Mr. Coenen's Concerts, in 1875. Musicians could not fail to recognise the remarkable promise shown in the Quartet, even making the fullest allowance for the influence of Schumann, which is perceptible; and though Mr. Mackenzie has written far more important and more original works since that time, in other departments of art, in chamber-music the Quartet has not yet been eclipsed. Another interesting audience was better pleased with her singing of Pur-cell's delightfully quaint and piquant air "Nymphs and Shepherds." Schubert's Quartet in A minor (Op. 29) and item was Schumann's "Papillons," Op. 2, played, for the first time, by Mr. Charles Hallé. These somewhat fantastic, but extremely piquant, little pieces belong to that early period of the composer's career when his romantic but thoroughly artistic nature effervesced, so to speak, in musical and literary manifestations singularly opposed to the pedantic and dry-as-dust state into which music fell after the death of Beethoven and Schubert. "Papillons" greatly pleased the audience, Mr. Hallé rendering them in his most characteristic manner. Beethoven's Rasoumowski Quartet in F, No. 1, completed the list of instrumental works. Mr. Santley, the vocalist of the afternoon, sang three of his most popular songs, and the Concert, as a whole, was very enjoyable.

The programme on the 1st, as already indicated, was less noteworthy. The concerted works were Beethoven's Quartet in D, Op. 18, No. 3; Brahms's Pianoforte Quartet in G minor, Op. 25, and Mozart's Duet in G for violin and viola. Miss Zimmermann was the pianist, her selections being Chopin's Impromptu in F sharp, and two of the Etudes, which she played in her customary artistic and unostentatious manner. Miss Louise Phillips and Madame Fassett repeated some of their pleasing vocal duets. the Concert of Saturday, the 6th, the pianist was Mdlle. Marie Fromm, who created a more favourable impression than on the occasion of her début. Her solos included a Scherzo in D minor, by Madame Schumann, and it is stated that she is a pupil of this great artist, which may account for certain mannerisms in her playing. Her best quality at present is a sympathetic touch, and with perseverance she may attain to high rank as an artist. The concerted works on this occasion were Mozart's delightful The Quartet in D, No. 10, and Mendelssohn's Trio in D minor, Op. 49, Mr. Maas being the vocalist.

A more attractive programme on the 8th naturally attracted a more numerous audience than those of the previous Mondays. Mendelssohn's posthumous Quartet in E flat is one of the most interesting of those early compositions which his fastidious nature would not permit him to give to the world. Though written when he was a boy of fourteen, it is perfect in form, developed with the freedom of style that only an experienced composer usually exhibits, and musically effective in a rare degree. Possibly Zelter may have put some finishing touches to the fugal finale, but the rest of the work is evidently from the same hand that wrote the Ottetto and the Quintet in A. Brahms's Trio in C, Op. 87, a recent yet very fresh and lucid utterance of the gifted composer, was warmly received, and two works of Beethoven, the Sonata in E minor, Op. 90, and the piano and violin Sonata, in A minor, Op. 23, completed the scheme. Mr. Charles Hallé was the pianist, and Madame Sophie Löwe the vocalist. On the following Saturday there was scarcely anything worthy of note. Mozart's Quartet in B flat, No. 3, of the Haydn set, Beethoven's Sonata in A for pianoforte and violoncello, Op. 69, and Mendelssohn's posthumous fragments of a Quartet were the concerted works, and Mdlle. Kleeberg played Schumann's now popular "Carnaval."

In a critical sense the programme of Monday, the 15th, calls for a longer notice both as regards the instrumental and vocal items. Among the former was Mozart's Duet for violin and viola in B flat, introduced probably owing to the success of the companion work in G a few weeks previously. The circumstances which led to the composition of these Duets were narrated in the December number of THE MUSICAL TIMES. Of the three movements of which the Duet in B flat consists, the first is the most effective, but they are all remarkably ingenious in the part writing. Mdlle. Kleeberg should not have used Hans von Bülow's amplified and modernised edition of Bach's Chromatic Fantasia without previous announcement. doubt a majority of the audience imagined they were listening to Bach's music pure and simple. It was still more puzzling to be told in the analytical programme that Bach died on February 28, and also on July 30, 1750. The date usually given is July 28. Miss Maude Valèrie White affords a good example in setting only high class poetry tomusic, but genius of the loftiest order could alone render justice to Tennyson's "In Memoriam." Her four songs

Haydn's Trio, in G, completed an excellent programme. The final programme before Christmas, on Saturday, the oth ult., consisted entirely of Beethoven's works. Very 20th ult., consisted entirely of Beethoven's works. fine performances were given of the Quintet in C, Op. 29, and the Kreutzer Sonata for violin and piano, Op. 47, Miss Zimmermann played the Sonata Patétique, and Mr. Thorndike sang three of the Lieder very acceptably. Madame Néruda has been the leader at all the Concerts, with one exception, and will continue to occupy the post until the arrival of Herr Joachim at the end of February.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL CHORAL SOCIETY.

THE "Faust" of Berlioz has now fairly taken its place in the répertoire of this Society, and its annual performance may be looked for with confidence by subscribers. If some of the more delicate orchestral effects are lost in the vast area of the Albert Hall, there is compensation in the truly superb rendering of the choruses. Mr. Barnby's choir literally covered itself with glory at the performance of November 26, the rendering of every number being as nearly perfect as even the fastidious composer could have desired. Madame Valleria undertook, for the first time, the part of Marguerite, which she sang with much artistic feeling; and Mr. Barrington Foote also made his début as Mephistopheles. He deserves hearty commendation for his clear enunciation of the words, and the dramatic force he infused into the music. Mr. Lloyd as Faust and Mr. Pyatt as Brander were as acceptable as on former occasions. A performance of "Elijah" by this Society always draws an immense audience, and no exception to the rule occurred on the 10th ult., despite the inclement weather. The interpretation was as effective as usual, which means that almost perfect justice was rendered to Mendelssohn's favourite oratorio. The splendid training of the choir under Mr. Barnby was once more evinced, the precision in attack, attention to the nuances, and clear enunciation of the words being beyond all praise. Madame Albani, Madame Patey, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley could not be surpassed, either individually or collectively, as the principal soloists; but their manner of interpreting the share of the work that falls to them is so well known that it is needless to enter into details. Miss Hilda Coward rendered excellent service in the subsidiary soprano music, and Madame Norman displayed a mezzo-soprano voice of good quality in the beautiful air "Woe unto them."

"The Rose of Sharon" will be performed at the

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

THE Sacred Harmonic Society's performance of "The Messiah," at St. James's Hall, on the 9th ult., showed that the strictures passed on the efforts of the choir this season have been taken to heart. Under the skilful direction of Mr. Cummings, the choruses were sung with more than ordinary vigour and precision, even those numbers which usually suffer from want of rehearsal, such as "And he shall purify," and "Let us break their bonds," being given with commendable accuracy. having been once learnt, it is to be hoped that it will not be quickly forgotten. Adequate justice was rendered to the solos by Madame Valleria, Madame Fassett, Mr. Maas, and Mr. Bridson, MDLLE. KLEEBERG'S RECITAL.

ALTHOUGH the musical public is frequently, and not unjustly, taxed with its tardiness in recognising the merit of new enterprises, foreign pianists of genuine ability cannot complain of any lack of appreciation when they pay pro-fessional visits to our metropolis. The remarkable execu-tive abilities of the young French artist, Mdlle. Clotilde Kleeberg, for example, have quickly won her a place in popular favour, and at her Recital at the Prince's Hall on the afternoon of the 3rd ult., there was a crowded attendance. At the same time the want of good manners in the matter of punctuality, which so frequently characterises London audiences, was more than usually apparent. Scarcely had the last of the late comers settled in their places than others began to depart, so that no portion of the Recital was heard in undisturbed comfort. It is fair however to say that the pianist did not appear in the slightest degree discomposed by the constant interruptions. On the contrary, nearly the whole of her well selected programme was interpreted in a manner that must have satisfied those of the most hypercritical tastes. Mdlle. Klee-berg's versatility is one of her most noteworthy qualities, and another is her artistic conscientiousness. She rendered two of Bach's 48 Preludes and Fugues, and a Suite of Handel, with beautifully finished technique, and without any of that senseless modernising of the text in which some pianists indulge. Her charm of touch and command of expression were displayed in a number of minor items by Raff, Liszt, Schumann, and others, and she gave a purely classical, if not remarkably powerful interpretation, of Beethoven's "Waldstein" Sonata. Only in some pieces by Chopin was there anything left to desire, which is somewhat singular, as Mdlle. Kleeberg has studied in Paris, where, if anywhere, the true Chopin traditions ought to linger. Speaking generally, however, Mdlle. Kleeberg has few equals as an executant among those pianists who have recently appeared.

BACH'S BEETHOVEN CONCERT.

UNDER this remarkable heading an equally remarkable performance was given at the Prince's Hall on the 19th ult. Herr Leonard Emil Bach, described as pianist to the Royal Court of Prussia, is apparently of the opinion that it is impossible to have too much of a good thing, and therefore undertook to play three of Beethoven's pianoforte Concertos (the works in C, C minor, and E flat) at one sitting. The public did not seem much interested in the experiment; and we cannot affirm that they lost a great deal by staying away. Only a pianist of extraordinary powers could render such a programme interesting, and Herr Bach failed to justify his departure from the observance of moderation in quantity. He has some good points as a pianist, notably a light and delicate touch, which would doubtless enable him to render pieces of small calibre with effect, but he has not the power and breadth of style necessary to the interpretation of Beethoven's greatest works, and in order, apparently, to hide his deficiences, he made unjustifiable additions to the text, thereby alienating the sympathies of all true artists. fair to add that the instrument he used was not only out of tune, but inferior in tone, while the orchestra, though led by so excellent a musician as Mr. Randegger, was frequently at fault.

HIGHBURY PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

This Society gave its first Concert of the season at the Highbury Athenæum, on Monday, the 1st ult. The important item of the programme was Mr. C. Harford Lloyd's new dramatic Cantata, "Hero and Leander," conducted by the composer, who came to town specially to be present. The part of Hero was sustained by Miss Agnes Larkcom, who sang well throughout, though her declamation of the final dramatic scena, "Oh, Love, Love!" was wanting in intense passion. The high baritone part of Leander is exactly suited to Mr. Bridson's voice and style, and he consequently was most successful. The choral singing was good, and when we consider that both band and chorus were entirely strange to Mr. Lloyd's beat, the accompaniments and ensemble left little to desire. The violin, corno Inglese, and harp obbligatos were well played by Messrs. Tidey and Browne and Miss Adelaide Arnold. Mr. Lloyd received quite an ovation from audience and orchestra at the conclusion of the performance of his Cantata, and he must be again congratulated on having composed so admirable a work, and one so well within the means of our numerous amateur Societies. The remainder of the programme comprised Rossini's "Stabat Mater," Nicolai's Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor," and songs by Mr. Charles Chilley and Miss Clara Myers.

We are pleased to notice a decided improvement in both the band and chorus of the Society, a result, we believe, not only due to the admirable conducting of Dr. Bridge at the Concert and full rehearsals, but also to the careful way in which the separate practices are directed by Messrs.

Betjemann and Beardwell.

BOROUGH OF HACKNEY CHORAL ASSOCIATION.

As all new choral works of importance are brought before the notice of the subscribers of this enterprising Society with as little delay as possible, a performance of Dvorák's "Stabat Mater" was looked for as a matter of course. It was duly given, on the 22nd ult., at the Shoreditch Town Hall, which was completely filled with an attentive and most enthusiastic audience. The preparation of this superb but exceedingly difficult work must have given Mr. Prout and his choir much trouble, and it is therefore gratifying to be able to state that the rendering was, on the whole, of remarkable excellence. Indeed, we have never heard the Hackney choir to greater advantage. There was not one important slip from beginning to end; and not only in power and vigour, but in quality of tone, the singing was admirable. The sopranos especially distinguished themselves, their clear ringing notes being prominent above the full orchestra. One or two of the movements were taken somewhat too fast-more particularly the "Eia Mater" and the middle section of the "Tui nati"; and more delicacy might have been observed in pianissimo passages, both in voices and orchestra; but it is almost hypercritical to call attention to minor defects where there was so much to praise. We believe Mr. Prout had the advantage of personal directions from the composer as to the manner of performance, which enabled him to introduce those incidental modifications of tempi so characteristic of Dvorák and the music of his country. An admirable quartet of soloists had been engaged. Miss Hilda Wilson sang the "Inflammatus" magnificently, and Miss Eleanor Farnol was extremely earnest and intelligent in the soprano music. Mr. Kenningham and Mr. Bridson were almost equally worthy of commendation. The second part of the Concert was brief, but appropriate, consisting of Beethoven's C minor Symphony and the Chorus "Hallelujah to the Father" (from "The Mount of Olives").

GUILDHALL SCHOOL OF MUSIC.

THE crowded audience that assembled by invitation at the Orchestral and Choral Concert given in the Guildhall, on the 13th ult., was evidently more interested in the efforts of the students of the school than in those of the band and choir. At the same time it is to be hoped that the young pupils will not over estimate the value of the applause they received, as although several of them showed considerable promise, in not more than one instance was absolute proficiency exhibited. The exception was Miss Cora Cardigan, whose flute playing showed complete mastery over the instrument. Master Saunders played two movements of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto very commendably. Among the vocalists the most promising were Miss Bessie Diamond (soprano), Mr. Iver McKay (tenor), and Mr. Sidney Beckley (baritone). Both the orchestra and chorus showed the excellent results of Mr. Weist Hill's admirable training, the former in the Overture to "Ruy Blas," and the first movement of the "Eroica Symphony," and the latter in Mendelssohn's 95th Psalm. We are pleased to learn that a site has been found for the erection of a new building for the Guildhall School of Music, on the Thames Embankment. Accommodation will be provided for 4,000 students, a number that will probably be realised, judging from the present rapid growth of the institution.

MADAME SOPHIE LÖWE'S MUSICAL EVENINGS.

Among the many performances of chamber music lately given, those of Madame Sophie Löwe, at the Prince's Hall, on the 5th and 12th ult., were, perhaps, the most agreeable. On the first occasion the programme consisted of selections from the works of Schubert and Schumann, the Concert giver being assisted by Miss Lena Little, a vocalist with a very sympathetic mezzo-soprano voice; while the selections for violin and pianoforte were safe in the hands of such artists as Miss Zimmermann and Miss Emily Shinner. Of Schubert the items were the Rondeau Brillant for piano and violin (Op. 70), some of the minor piano pieces, too seldom heard in the Concert-room, and five Schumann was represented by the Phantasie Stücke for piano and violin, piano solos, and several songs and duets. In the course of the evening a circumstance occurred which might have had serious consequences but for the presence of mind of Miss Zimmermann. An alarm of fire was raised, and the appearance of a body of smoke showed that it was not groundless. However, a panic was averted by the coolness of the pianist, who kept her seat and waited patiently until all danger was at an end, when she resumed her performance as if nothing had happened. The second programme was dedicated entirely to Brahms, and included the first set of the Liebeslieder Walzer, Op. 52, which were effectively rendered by the lady vocalists above named, and Messrs. Shakespeare and R. Watkin Mills. An excellent performance was given of the Piano and Violin Sonata in G. Op. 78, and some of the Hungarian Dances by Miss Zimmermann and Herr Gompertz.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE multiplicity of musical events with which the season opened has apparently undergone something of a relapse since our last notice appeared, and whilst Concerts of the mediocre standard have been fairly numerous, it will remain for Christmastide, with its series of "Messiah" and other oratorio performances, and the return of the Carl Rosa Opera Company to Liverpool, to revive the interest and enthusiasm of the musical public and the fifth Concert, held on the 2nd ult., was not lacking in the essentials of an interesting and enjoyable performance. Prominent in importance, the skilful rendering of Haydn's Symphony in D (being No. 2 of the Salomon series) bore fitting testimony to the genius which inspired a composition stamped by purity of conception and melodious instrumentation. The other orchestral items comprised the overtures to Spohr's "Faust," Berlioz's "Waverley," and Reinecke's "König Manfred." Of these the specimen from Spohr bore the palm for dramatic intensity, whilst, on the other hand, one can scarcely realise in the overture to "Waverley" the fiery genius and fervour which characterise Berlioz's subsequent efforts. Mr. Halle's delicate skill and executive ability insured a perfect interpretation of Beethoven's Pianoforte Concerto in C minor. Madame Trebelli was the vocalist.

The Fourth Concert of the Hallé series, held in the Philharmonic Hall, on Tuesday, the 9th ult., brought to a fitting conclusion the first half of the season's programme. Schumann's Symphony, No. 2, in C (Op. 61), formed the chief feature for the orchestra, and revealed in a striking manner the ideality of a composer whose artistic powers enabled him to work out such masterpieces with singular comprehensiveness and elaborate delicacy. The rendering of the Symphony by Mr. Halle's band merits the warmest praise, every movement being followed with the closest attention by a thoroughly earnest audience. The Scherzo and the Adagio espressivo were particularly impressive, the effect of the delicate and fascinating "love song" in the latter movement being almost heavenly. The overtures to "Egmont," Hérold's "Le pré aux clercs," and the "Charfreitag's Zauber " from "Parsifal," an unusually mild specimen of Wagner's genius, formed the other orchestral contributions. Madame Norman-Néruda was the solo violinist, and in Spohr's Concerto, No. 7, in E minor, again evidenced the possession of marvellous purity of tone and executive ability. Madame Néruda also showed to advantage with Herr Straus in a seldom heard duet for violin and viola, which, whilst full of pleasant themes, is perhaps chiefly interesting from the pretty little story which attributes the composition to the good heartedness of Mozart in his efforts to befriend a fellow artist. Mdlle. Barbi, a young Italian artist, who came to Liverpool with flattering credentials, showed in her varied selections careful training and dramatic feeling. Her best efforts were displayed in two pretty German lieder, by Schubert and Schumann, which appeared more suitable to her capabilities than the florid solos of the Rossini school.

The Classical Chamber Concert, held in the rooms of the Wavertree Choral Society, on the 1st ult., deserves more than a passing notice. The carefully selected promore than a passing notice. The carefully selected programme comprised, amongst other items, trios for violin, violoncello, and pianoforte, by Hummel, Mozart, and Haydn, all of which received a faithful interpretation by Messrs. W. E., T. A., and F. W. Pinckney. Mr. W. E. Pinckney, as solo violinist, revealed, in a Barcarole by Spohr, commendable qualities of technique and purity of style. With but limited facilities, and labouring under the difficulties incidental to such an undertaking, the promoters of the Wavertree Choral Society, and particularly the Conductor, Mr. Fred. Pinckney, are worthy of considerable credit for their enterprise in fostering, by the means at their disposal, a musical spirit and interest in this out township, which will doubtless yield good fruit. The Society promises a performance of Mackenzie's Cantata "The Bride." during the coming month, and a careful rendering may be antici-

THE Concert held in the Concert-room of St. George's Hall, on Saturday afternoon, the 20th ult., in aid of Mrs. Burt's Sheltering Homes, introduced to Liverpool amongst other London artists, Miss Hope Glenn, Miss Wakefield, other London artists, Miss Hope Glenn, Miss Wakeheld, and Mr. J. Robertson. Miss Glenn invested Gounod's "There is a green hill far away" with considerable pathos and expression, and was equally successful in Miss Wakefield's song "Lass and Lad." Mr. Robertson's best efforts were in Tosti's "Good-bye," for which he earned a persistent encore. and in the duet with Miss Wakefield, "Sous les Etoiles." Miss Maude Valèrie White, several of whose bellage formed in the approximate ability of the control of the several whose ballads figured in the programme, evinced ability as During this interim, however, the Philharmonic Society a composer, delicacy of touch as a pianist, and unobtrusive has turned over another leaf of the season's programme, art as accompanist. Mr. Carl Walther played a violin

On the same evening, in the Association Hall, Mount Pleasant, Mr. and Mrs. Sanders's private choir made its first appearance this season. The works performed comprised Hiller's "Song of Victory" and "The Erl-King's Daughter," by Gade. The rendering of these Cantatas was extremely creditable. exacting solos in the latter work were faithfully rendered; and the choir, although somewhat unequally balanced, was kept well in hand by the Conductor, Mr. James Sanders.

Mr. Best's Organ Recitals at St. George's Hall have recently been resumed, and take place as hitherto on Thursdays and Saturdays. With regard to these performances, however, we cannot but regret that, in the first place, Liverpool should show so little apprecia-tion of such classical Recitals; and, in the second, that the municipal authorities should expend a handsome sum for keeping Mr. Best's grand instrument in proper condition without securing the desired result. The vagaries of the St. George's Hall organ are becoming proverbial.

The Carl Rosa Opera Season, already announced with a flourish of trumpets, commences at the Court Theatre (Mr. Rosa's recent investment), on Christmas Day, with a sacred Concert, comprising Rossini's "Stabat Mater" and selections. The Concert is to be followed by an unusually lengthy series of performances, the novelties to Liverpool being Boïto's "Mefistofele," Millöcker's "Beggar Student," Stanford's "The Canterbury Pilgrims," and, for the first time in England, Massenet's "Manon." This enterprising programme speaks well for the success of the forthcoming operatic season.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM. (From our own Correspondent.)

One of the most noteworthy musical performances of the past year, so far as Birmingham is concerned, was that of Schubert's great Mass in E flat, which was given by the Festival Choral Society for the first time, at the Concert of November 27. The work had been previously heard in Birmingham, at an "open rehearsal" of the Amateur Harmonic Association in December, 1868, when it was attempted for the first time in England; but the executive resources on that occasion were of a somewhat imperfect order, and until the Festival Choral Society lately took the Mass in hand, its beauties were practically a sealed book to our local music lovers. Composed in June, 1828, only five months before the death of its gifted composer, it is distinguished by a maturity of style and a mastery of form which are too often wanting in the composer's earlier and shorter Masses, the choral and orchestral portions being especially impressive. Considering the exceeding difficulty of some portions of the work; and especially the chromatic passages in the fugal chorus, "Cum sancto spiritu," and the opening of the Sanctus, the performance was a remarkably creditable and effective one. The principal vocalists—Miss Thudichum, Miss Helen D'Alton, Mr. J. W. Turner, Mr. Richard Clarke, and Mr. John Bridson—were all fairly good, but the Mass does not afford much scope for soloists, and, with the exception of the Canon for three voices in the "Et incarnatus," and the Quartet in the Benedictus, the interest of the work is chiefly choral. The band did full justice to the many striking effects in the instrumentation, especially the original employment of drums in the Credo, which opens with a couple of bars of drum solo, the subsequent combination of drums and double-basses, the use of the trombones pianissimo and the choral singing throughout, being marked by spirit, refinement, and breadth of tone. Barnett's familiar setting of "The Ancient Mariner," originally produced at the Birmingham Festival furnished the second part of the entertainment, and afforded the vocal principals opportunities of display denied them in the Mass, of which they successfully availed themselves. Miss Thudichum, an Academy pupil with a light flexible soprano voice, was particularly effective in "The fair breeze blew," and in the charming duet "Two voices in the air," in which she was joined by Miss D'Alton. The last-mentioned lady pleased the audience concerto by De Beriot, and Mr. H. Steudner Welsing greatly in the soothing, tender air "O sleep, it is a gentle completed an admirable programme by his careful and thing." Mr. Richard Clarke, a young local singer who spirited interpretation of Schumann's "Triumphal March," replaced Mr. Turner at short notice in the tenor solos, produced a very favourable impression, and Mr. Bridson was especially successful in the graphic song "Swiftly,

The members of the Amateur Harmonic Association laid the local musical public under an obligation by their Concert of the 4th ult., when they introduced to Birmingham a new composer in the Rev. Henry Hodson, whose dramatic Cantata, based on Longfellow's "Golden Legend," was performed here in the presence of a large audience with evidences of popular approval even more marked than those which attended its production at Lichfield in April of last year. The performance, however, was a somewhat imperiect one, owing to the weakness of the choir, which mustered somewhat under a hundred, and was consequently overbalanced in the fully accompanied portions by the band, which numbered forty-five vigorous performers. Nevertheless, the tuneful and graceful character of the work and the thoroughness of the harmonic treatment, impressed the audience very favourably, and at the close of the Concert the composer was loudly called for and cheered. The Cantata, which embraces the whole subject of the poem, omitting only the minor episodes, consists of four parts, a prologue setting forth the mystic argument, and the conflict of Lucifer and his host with the bells of Strasburg Cathedral, three divisions devoted to the story of Elsie's heroic devotion to the Prince of Hoheneck, whose life she saves, and whose hand rewards her service, and a brief epilogue. The musical treatment of the work is essentially dramatic, and consists largely of solos and concerted pieces, with comparatively few choral interpolations. Hence the choral deficiencies of the performance were not so conspicuous as they otherwise must have been. Mr. Hodson exhibits a good feeling for form and rhythm, and a fondness for canonical writing, but his music, though always scholarly and tuneful, and often in-geniously harmonised and fancifully scored for the band, is, as a whole, somewhat wanting in individuality and style. He appears to be very much under the influence still of his models, and evidently shrinks from any marked departure from conventional lines. With more experience he will probably gain more confidence, and as he is not wanting either in the melodic faculty or in musical scholarship, he ought to produce something of sterling worth by and by. In the purely instrumental movements, the Prelude and the Wedding March, and the pageant music, the composer evidences facility in orchestral writing, and is especially felicitous in his scoring for the reeds, but he is more at home in the expression of bright and joyous, tender and pathetic sentiments than in the language of passion or the suggestion of weird and supernatural elements. principal vocalists were Madame Worrell, who "doubled" the characters of Elsie and the Angel of Good Deeds, Miss Ellen Marchant, who appeared as Ursula, Mr. Alfred Kenningham, who sustained the part of the Prince, and Mr. D. Harrison, upon whom devolved the music of Lucifer and Gottlieb.

The musical section of the Midland Institute gave the third of the series of Chamber Concerts on Saturday, the 6th ult., when the leading features of the programme were Mendelssohn's String Quartet in D, Op. 44, No. 1, and Spohr's Piano Quintet in D minor, Op. 130. The Menby Herr Pettersson, Miss L. Dixon, Mr. T. M. Abbott, and Mr. A. J. Priestley, the Minuet and Andante being distinguished by great delicacy and feeling. The same artists, with the addition of Mrs. Hale, who undertook the pianoforte part, gave a capital rendering of the Spohr Quintet, the beautiful Adagio being heard perhaps to most advantage. Miss G. Poulton displayed considerable taste in the vocal items, and Mrs. Hale and Herr Pettersson gave great satisfaction at the piano and violin respectively.

On the same evening as the foregoing Concert, the Birmingham Musical Association, supported by Miss José Sherrington, Miss Ellen Marchant, Mr. D'Arcy Ferris, and Mr. Arthur Rousby, gave a performance of F. H. Cowen's Cantata "The Rose Maiden." The services of the King's Heath and Moseley Choral Society were also enlisted, together with about thirty amateur instrumentalists, assisted by Mr. F. Ward as first The performance of the choruses can hardly be mentioned in the terms of praise which would apply to the solo and instrumental portions of the work. For some unexplained reason also, parts of the tenor music were suppressed. The Cantata was followed by a miscellaneous selection, the whole being conducted by Mr. F. W. Cook.

At Mr. Stockley's second Orchestral Concert, on the 12th ult., the principal items were Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's Ballade for orchestra, "La belle dame sans merci," Mr. Cowen's Fourth Symphony in B flat minor and Suite de Coverture to "Mirella." The Ballade illustrative of Keats' poem, and composed for the London Philharmonic Society, by whom it was produced in 1883, was heard on this occasion for the first time in Birmingham. It is a work that perhaps appeals more to the educated musician than to the average Concert-goer, but its high imaginative quality, its earnestness, and the individuality of the composer's style powerfully impressed the more thoughtful section of the audience. Mr. Cowen's Welsh Symphony, though composed perhaps of less picturesque and striking elements than his Scandinavian Symphony, is certainly not inferior to it in musicianship, originality, or command of the resources of the orchestra, and its performance, which was conducted on this occasion by the composer in person, proved a great success, and elicited enthusiastic applause. Equally effective was the more familiar "Language of the Flowers" at a later period, the Gavotte movement, descriptive of "The Yellow Jasmine." provoking a rapturous encore. Mr. Charles Ould delighted the audience by his finished performance of a Polonaise for the violoncello, by Dunkler, which would probably have been heard to more advantage however in a smaller room, and Messrs. Goddard, Bell, Engleman, and Hannan created quite a furore in a trombone quartet, by Adolphe Adam. Madame Rose Hersee was more successful in Benedict's "Scenes of my youth," to which Mrs. Priscilla Frost contributed the harp accom-paniment, than in Rossini's "Una voce." Mr. Edward Lloyd was in excellent voice, and excited great enthusiasm in Gounod's "Lend me your aid" and Mackenzie's love-song from "The Rose of Sharon."

The Edgbaston Amateur Musical Union gave an interesting Concert, under the conductorship of Mr. A. J. Sutton, on the 17th ult. The orchestral items consisted of Schubert's unfinished Symphony in B minor; a Russian Suite in E, for stringed orchestra and violin obbligato; Spohr's Concerto-dramatico, for violin and orchestra; Mendelssohn's Trumpet Overture; Macfarren's "Chevy Chase" Overture (composed in 1836 for Planché's melodramatic spectacle), and the Overture to "Zampa." overtures, and especially that of Hérold, the band exhibited commendable steadiness and spirit. In the Schubert Symphony it was somewhat lacking in refinement and truth of intonation. On the whole, however, the amateurs showed decided progress since their previous appearance in public. Mrs. Ferni's violin-playing was admirable in tone and execution, and lacked but little in expressiveness. The vocal honours of the evening fell to Mrs. S. J. Mason, who exhibited an excellent voice and method in excerpts from "Joshua," "Eli," and Mozart's "Idomeneo."

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE musical season in Manchester is now full of apparent life, although not invested with much novelty or freshness. In addition to the larger performances, now almost nightly given, some of the stars of the opera and of the Concert rooms pay us occasional visits, and regale us with their usual much worn show pieces. But, in spite of all our bustle and pretension there is little opportunity afforded to the earnest student of becoming acquainted with new works, or of keeping pace with the progress of modern ideas. Competition is doing some-thing to improve the style of performance, but little to increase the interest of our programmes. After considerable delay, we have enjoyed an opportunity of hearing should stimulate the Conductor to a graceful response to Dvorák's now pretty well known "Stabat Mater," and it is judged safe and wise to announce some of his smaller works; but we must wait patiently for Mackenzie's "Rose of Sharon" as we had to do for his "Jason." Now, apart altogether from any question of high merit, it is not creditable to Manchester-I say, advisedly, to Manchester, and not to any individual Concert giver-that works of celebrity should be denied a hearing here until two or three years after their first performance. We ought to be a little keener in our search after novelty, and to remember that, after all, the general musical public has a right to hear and to judge, as ultimately it must and will, of the merit of the important works of recognised composers.

Excepting only this charge of continued and exclusive reliance upon well-known works there is, perhaps, little cause of complaint. The greater central and the smaller suburban speculations continue successfully to appeal for public support. Even the "Gentlemen's Concerts," under an experimental and a somewhat heterogeneous scheme, have attracted many new subscribers and obtained a new chance of continuance. By reducing the number of orchestral Concerts-and thereby forfeiting, perhaps, some of the claim to respect which a long perseverance in the rendering of symphonic works was supposed to have conferred -a considerable reduction of expense has been effected; while, by availing themselves of Mr. Halle's services for a series of afternoon Pianoforte Recitals, the directors have appealed to many lovers of music who, living in the surrounding towns and unable comfortably to attend the rounding Concerts, had previously held altogether aloof from the institution. The popularity which has already attended these recitals clearly shows a direction in which the comparatively small but cosy Concert Hall may be frequently and beneficially utilized; and it would certainly be advisable to try whether the admirable chamber music party of Signor Risegari-which has so perseveringly and vainly endeavoured to attract remunerative audiences in the evening-would not, alternately with the pianoforte and other performances, find at last due recognition, and its proper place as a highly instructive part of our general musical programme. It cannot be denied that for many years the Gentlemen's Concert exerted an important influence upon lines now occupied by larger and more popular undertakings. And under a liberal-minded and more modernly-conceived direction, there yet is plenty of scope for an institution which, preserving much of the social charm that has always attracted, shall perceive the changed state of the surroundings and recognise that, while orchestral music of different grades of development will always appeal powerfully to the popular taste, a refined performance of more chastened and less demonstrative works must command a more limited allegiance, and require a calmer and a more reflective attention from such a number of students as the Concert Hall would well accommodate, and would place under conditions favourable for appreciation.

In the large Free Trade Hall orchestral works are heard to far more advantage. Indeed, Mr. Hallé has this season increased his band to 100 performers; and with this augmented force he has, in each of his miscellaneous programmes, introduced some example of modern scoring. At all previous hearings in Manchester of Wagner's music the very great mistake had been made of seizing the opportunity afforded by an unusual number of instrumentalists in order to give several selections of like kind, exciting similar emotions and exhibiting orchestration of the same nature, and thereby of causing an added monotony which Wagner, less than any other author of anything like equal celebrity, is able to bear. By selecting one Wagnerian movement, and by carefully contrasting it with the remainder of the programme, the peculiarities of the composer have this season been more fairly placed before the audience; and an unprejudiced judgment as to merit of idea. clearness of construction, and felicity of interpretation has been rendered possible. In the production of Dvorák's great "Stabat Mater," Mr. Hallé enjoyed the assistance of his energetic Choirmaster, Mr. Hecht, and, although the great length of the work and the similarity of style throughout the whole were trying to a mixed audience, yet the warm welcome accorded, and the opinion freely expressed.

the general desire that some other novelty may be included among the choral works yet to be given. I must not omit among the characteristics and his subscribers upon the en-gagement of Miss Zimmermann, who, by her playing of Schumann's Concerto, and other pieces, largely increased the number of her admirers here. Nor would I fail to notice the generous rivalry in the engagement of vocalists of high standing, by which Mr. Hallé and Mr. De Jong appear to be animated. The former gentleman has twice had the assistance of Madame Albani at his miscellaneous Concerts, besides enjoying her valuable co-operation in the two performances of the "Messiah," given, as usual, in the week before Christmas. Mdlle. Barbi and Madame Hauk also have received warm welcome, and Madame Norman-Néruda attracted an audience as crowded as enthusiastic.

Mr. De Jong has brought down a host of stars; and his improved band, in addition to the overtures and selections of previous seasons, has (following the example of the late Mons. Jullien) been employed in such detached symphonic movements as Beethoven's "Allegretto Scherzando," in

B flat, from the Eighth Symphony.

The cheaper Working Men's Concerts, which Mr. De Jong has superintended, have been so largely attended as to lead to the experiment of having additional performances on various evenings.

Among the Societies devoted to choral music, the Athenæum Musical Society, now in its eighteenth season, under Dr. Hiles's control, has long been famous for the delicacy of its refined part-singing, and for its ready response to the requirements of its Conductor. In its programmes English music of high character has always been largely represented; and at the first Concert of this season, a new operetta by the Conductor, "War in the Household," and C. H. Lloyd's "Hero and Leander," were very warmly received. Both works were, a few nights later, given by the North Manchester Musical Society to a large and appreciative audience. By the Athenæum Musical Society many of our best vocalists have been introduced, and at no time has there been greater promise of future excellence.

The Stretford Choral Society continues, under Mr. Hecht's able guidance, to progress satisfactorily. Public attention has been directed rather forcibly to the importance of music as an educational power by several lecturers at the Town Hall and at the Owens College; as well as more recently by the able address which the Rev. Sir F. A. G. Ouseley delivered at the distribution of the certificates awarded at the first examinations held under the auspices of the Society of Professional Musicians. There is little doubt that a very general and healthy feeling has been aroused in favour of fair play for English music; a feeling that Concert-givers would do well to notice, Both at the Town Hall and at the banquet subsequently given in his honour at the Grand Hotel, Sir Frederick spoke warmly of the hopeful view he took of the future of the Society, and of the prospect opening out for English music. Another encouraging thing is that large classes for instruction upon orchestral instruments have been formed here, and earnest efforts are being made to bring such tuition within the reach of all classes of the community.

At the Town Hall several organ performances have been given by Herr Kayser, of Hagon, in Westphalia, a player new to Manchester. At the first Recital, on Thursday evening, the 16th ult., Herr Kayser displayed masterly execution. Probably his unfamiliarity with the organ—of French design and construction—interfered with his registering, which was scarcely sufficiently varied for a Concert-room. Perhaps more than the usual heaviness attending organ performances thus damped the enthusiasm that would otherwise have been excited by very skilful playing.

Messrs. Heywood, the great Manchester publishers, announce a new and most interesting journal, "The Musical Quarterly Review," the first number of which will appear February 20, 1885, and contain important articles by eminent musicians and literary authorities. The work will also be the authorised channel of communication between the different sections of the "Society of Professional Musicians"; and between the Society and the musical world generally.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE past month has been a remarkably busy one for Yorkshire musicians. Concerts have been so numerous and so excellent in material that it is difficult to say how to begin and where to stop in recording them. Bare reference to the majority of them must suffice.

On November 24, the Bradford Glee Union produced something in the nature of a novelty at its annual Concert, namely, Felicien David's Symphonic Ode "The Desert, the unceasing melody and picturesqueness of which produced a marked effect. At the same time there were many weak points in the performance, weakness where there should have been most strength, namely, in the orchestral part of the work. The band had to rely in great measure upon the harmonium for effects which ought properly to have been distributed among several other instruments, and there was, moreover, a want of appropriate instrumental colouring which was far from satisfactory. The vocalists executed their share with excellent precision and dramatic effect. The second part of the Concert, which was of a miscellaneous description, was rendered especially attractive by the fine singing of Miss Sara Gisburne. The Conductor was Mr. J. McBurnie.

The second of the Bradford Subscription Concerts took place on November 28, and was devoted to chamber music, of which Mr. Hallé provided an excellent programme. The work which perhaps engaged most serious attention was Brahms's Sextet in B flat. Played as it was with skill and experience by Madame Norman-Néruda, Signor Risegari, Herr Straus, Herr Spielman, Signor Piatti, and Mr. Smith, the work drew forth the warmest appreciation. One movement, the genial Scherzo, the themes of which are worked out with engaging humour and spirit, had to be repeated. Two other masterpieces included in the programme were Beethoven's Trio in D (Op. 70), and Rheinberger's grand Quartet in E flat (Op. 38). The Beethoven Trio had an unfortunate place on the programme, but it was superbly rendered by Mr. Hallé, Madame Norman-Néruda, and Signor Piatti. Although a familiar feature of many recent chamber Concerts in this district, the Quartet proved none the less welcome on account of its noble themes and beautiful developments. Mozart's Theme and Variations in D minor gave the audience an opportunity of hearing Madame Norman-Néruda's refined violin playing. Madame Minnie Hauk, whose return to Bradford after a long absence was the subject of general satisfaction, won many new admirers by her charming vocalism.

The choir of the Leeds Parish Church has for one or two years past adopted for performance in connection with the Christmas Festival, in place of "The Messiah," Spohr's Oratorio "The Last Judgment," and that work was given on the 4th ult., the first Thursday in Advent. The choir was, as usual, well balanced and powerful, and the soloists—Miss Letitia Moore (Halifax), Master C. W. Bramham, Mr. G. Wadsworth, and Mr. W. Morton—sang with taste and skill. Dr. Creser again presided at the organ with musicianly skill. The choruses, "Destroyed is Babylon," and "Great and wonderful," were rendered with great power and effect.

The Leeds Amateur Orchestral Society, in changing its quarters from the Church Institute to the Albert Hall, may be said to have taken a progressive step. The opening Concert of the series, which took place on the 1st ult., was a distinct improvement upon those which have been given during the last three or four years. The past experience of the Society has not been altogether happy, but the members toil hard and with much spirit to win success. On this occasion they had the assistance of Mdlle. Bertha Brousil and Mr. Adolphe Brousil, besides the ordinary services of the Conductor, Mr. J. P. Bowling, himself an admirable pianist, whose contributions to the performances of the Society in past seasons have been excellent features. The band proved a little uneven, as of old, but generally speaking there was evidence of great improvement. It should be added that Mdlle. Brousil, Mr. Brousil, and Mr. Bowling brought forward an interesting composition by Hermann Goetz, namely, the first movement of his Trio for piano, violin, and cello (Op. 1), a work which contains some charming and scholarly treatment of themes.

A fine and powerful organ in St. Andrew's Church, Leeds, has recently been opened by a series of Recitals and Services, the Organists selected being Mr. G. W. Pilling, of Mirfield and Bolton, Mr. Alfred Benton, Mr. F. A. Sewell, Professor Bowling, Mr. W. H. Kemp, Mr. W. Widdop, Mr. C. E. Melville, and Mr. W. H. Smithson. The organ has been built by Mr. J. J. Binns of Bramley—the constructor of the fine instrument which was placed some time ago in the new church at Haworth and is a creditable piece of workmanship.

The Headingley Vocal Society gave its third annual Concert, on the 8th ult., under the conductorship of Mr. James Broughton. Mendelssohn's unfinished Oratorio "Christus" was selected for the first part of the Concert, and the second part of the programme was of a miscellaneous description. The choruses were rendered with finish and power, showing admirable musical material in the singers, and the influence of superior taste in their training. In the second part of the programme Miss Alderson Smith (violin) and Miss M. Alderson Smith (cello) joined with Mr. James Broughton in the performance of one of Gade's instrumental Trios.

The Armley and District Choral Society gave its first Concert of the season on the same evening, the works performed on the occasion being selected from the "Twelfth Mass," "The Daughter of Jairus," the "Lay of the Bell," and "The May Queen." The choir was well balanced and vigorous, and the solo vocalists sang with taste and skill worthy of so flourishing a Society.

The Garforth Choral Society amply justified its existence by an opening Concert on the 15th ult., when "The Last Judgment" was produced under the direction of Dr. Creser, and with the assistance of several members of his choir and other vocalists.

The Leeds Constabulary Band, a very useful musical institution, made an appeal for assistance by means of a Concert, which took place in the Victoria Hall, on the roth ult. Miss Damian, Mr. E. Dunkerton, Mr. E. Jackson, Dr. Spark, and Professor Bowling were associated with the solo vocal and instrumental portions of the programme; and the Concert was, as may be imagined, an enjoyable one.

At the seventh annual Subscription Concert of the Pudsey Choral Union, which took place on the 12th ult., under the direction of Mr. Owston, the "Hymn of Praise" and Rossini's "Stabat Mater" were performed, with the assistance of Miss Norton, Miss Parratt, Mr. Dunkerton, and Mr.

McCall as principals.

The first Concert of the Ripon Choral Society—a musical institution established quite recently—which took place on the 14th ult., secured a large and appreciative audience. Gade's Cantata "The Erl-King's Daughter," and a miscellaneous programme, afforded ample scope for the efforts of the Society, the establishment of which appears to have been fully justified by the result. Miss Stansfield, Mrs. J. Lister Smith, Mr. Simpson, and Mr. Richmond Sykes undertook the solos of Gade's work, and songs were also given by Mrs. C. H. Millyard and Mr. T. Precious. Mr. J. Lister Smith was the Conductor.

MUSIC IN THE WEST.

The two Concerts given by the Musical Festival Society, on Friday evening and Saturday afternoon, the 5th and 6th ult, attracted large audiences. The great interest centred upon Dvorák's "Stabat Mater," which was given on Friday evening. The principal vocalists were Madame Valleria, Miss Damian, Mr. Maas, and Mr. Santley. Mr. Hallé, whose band was engaged, of course, conducted. The chorus consisted of the members of the Bristol Festival Choir; Chorus-Master, Mr. D. W. Rootham; Organist, Mr. George Riseley. The choir was apirely belanced, and had evidently bestowed much pains upon the work, the difficulties of which can only be known by those who have studied it. There was much room for warm commendation, several numbers being excellently rendered; but there was one conspicuous fault throughout the evening, and that was a want of pianissimo. This was especially felt in the first chorus, where the lack of it frequently marred the effect. Mr. Halle's band, too, though delightful in the forte passages, and indeed in the choruses generally, sadly overpowered the singers in the solos, many portions even of Madame Valleria's solos being lost, the high notes alone being clearly heard. The second part of the programme was miscellaneous, and not, on the whole, a very interesting selection. Saturday's Concert opened with Goetz's 137th Psalm, "By the waters of Babylon." The choir did not show to such advantage as on the previous evening, and seemed not very much at home in the work. Madame Valleria was the soloist, and even her singing did not prevent the performance from falling rather flat. Next came Haydn's "Creation," which should be well known in Bristol. Many of the choruses were very finely sung, with great spirit and energy, but where the more delicate effects were required, as in the first chorus, the want of pianissimo was again apparent. The soloists were Miss Anna Williams, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley.

The Bristol Musical Association gave its twenty-eighth Concert in Colston Hall, on the 13th ult., when "The Messiah" was performed with full band, organ, and chorus. The soloists were Madame Wilson Osman, Miss Eleanor Rees, Mr. John Probert, and Mr. Henry Pope; Principal trumpet, Mr. William Ellis. Mr. George Riseley presided at the great organ, and Mr. George Gordon conducted, as usual.

The last for this year of the Monday Popular Concerts was given on the 16th ult., when Colston Hall was well filled with an appreciative audience. The chief item was Schubert's magnificent Symphony in C, given for the first time in Bristol, and which received an excellent rendering Mendelssohn's Overture "A Calm Sea and a Prosperous Voyage," the "Marche Hongroise" (from Berlioz's "La Damnation de Faust"), the Overture to "Masaniello" (Auber), and "Saltarello" and the "Danse des Bacchantes" (Gounod), and a selection from "Pinafore" completed the work of the band. The vocalists were Miss Arnold and Mr. C. H. Wade, who made their first appearances at these Concerts. In the absence of Mr. Carrington, Mr. Halfpenny led the band, and Mr. Risseley conducted with his usual ability.

Organ Recitals were given by Mr. G. Riseley, on the 6th and 20th ult., at Colston Hall.

The Sarum Choral Society gave its second Concert at the Assembly Rooms, Salisbury, on the roth ult., when Gade's "Psyche" was performed, with full band and chorus. Miss Amy Aylward, A.R.A.M., and Mr. Thorndike were the principal vocalists. The second part of the Concert included Sir Sterndale Bennett's Symphony in G minor, and songs by Mr. Thorndike and Miss Aylward, the latter singing "When daisies pied," with clarinet obbligato by Mr. Lazarus. The orchestra numbered thirty-two performers, led by Mr. Burnett, and Mr. W. P. Aylward conducted.

A very interesting Concert was given at Gloucester on the 9th ult., by the Gloucester Choral Society, when Dr. Gladstone's "Philippi" was performed. It may be mentioned that this was the first time this work had been heard in a Concert-room, and no doubt it was robbed of much of the effect the church would naturally lend to it. The performance, on the whole, was excellent; and the composer, who conducted, was warmly greeted by both audience and orchestra, and subsequently expressed himself extremely pleased with the way in which his work was rendered, pronouncing the performance the best that has yet been given of it. The principal singers were Mrs. Hutchinson, Miss Booth, of Gloucester, the Rev. C. H. Murphy, minor canon, Messrs. Evans, Cooke, and Woodward, lay-clerks of Gloucester Cathedral, and Mr. W. H. Phillips, all of whom rendered efficient help. The other works in the programme included the inimitable anthem "The Wilderness," by Dr. S. S. Wesley, and Mendelssohn's 42nd Psalm, "As the hart pants." Both works are somewhat exacting for chorus singers, but the rendering in each case was something to be proud of. The anthem derived much of its charm from the sympathetic singing of Mrs. Hutchinson, and in the 42nd Psalm her soprano solos were entity equally captivating to her audience. The other items were the chorus "Eia Mater," from Dvorák's "Stabat Mater," This the Overture to "Samson," and the Symphony in C minor from Spohr's "Last Judgment." The band left little to be decidedly better, especially in the strings. Herr Heck-desired in the accompaniments, and played the Overture mann made a most favourable impression in Bazzini's desired in the accompaniments, and played the Overture and Symphony with much spirit and intelligence. Mr. Williams deserves great praise, both for the ability with which he leads his forces in the orchestra and for the successful energy with which he has called upon the public to support the Society. We are glad to hear that the list of subscribers is larger than it has ever been, so that the committee is embarking upon another winter free from much of the anxiety of former years.

The Exeter Oratorio Society gave a performance of "Samson" at the Victoria Hall, on the 16th ult. The soloists were Madame A. Paget, Miss Ameris, Eos Morlais, and Mr. Farley Sinkins. Mr. E. M. Vinnicombe presided at the organ, and Mr. George Lyon conducted. The choir acquitted themselves very well, and the performance generally was successful.

MUSIC IN EDINBURGH.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

A CONCERT was given in the Music Hall, on the 2nd ult., in aid of the widow and family of the late Mr. Archibald Mackenzie, a member of the Edinburgh Select Choir, and a chorister in St. Mary's Cathedral. Choral music was contributed by the two choirs referred to, under their respective Conductors, Messrs. Hartley and Collinson; and instrumental selections were performed by members of the Amateur Orchestral Society, under Mr. Hamilton.

On the same evening the Musical Association connected with South College Street United Presbyterian Church, assisted by friends, gave a very creditable performance of Sterndale Bennett's "May Queen." Misses Clark and Laubach, and Messrs, Sinclair and Monroe were successful in rendering the melodious solos of the Cantata, which was followed by a miscellaneous selection.

The Edmunds family have been for many years associated with the profession of music in Edinburgh. Mr. Arthur Edmunds gave his annual Concert, on the 3rd ult., in the Freemasons' Hall. There was a large attendance. A choir of ladies gave its services. True to the family traditions, some Italian selections were included, Mr. Edmunds singing "Spirto gentil," with much taste. Curschmann's Trio "Addio" was gracefully rendered.

A Lecture on Madrigals and Glees was delivered by Mr. W. B. Alcock on the same date in Morningside Athenæum. Mr. Alcock gave some brief biographical sketches of writers of madrigals, mentioning in particular Thomas Morley, the editor of the "Triumphs of Oriana." Several musical illustrations were given by an excellent

Mr. William Blakeley gave an Organ Recital in Morningside U.P. Church, on the 8th ult., when selections from Bach, Mozart, Mendelssohn, Sullivan, and other composers, were ably performed. In Morningside Established Church on the same evening, Mr. W. H. Hopkinson submitted a well selected programme of organ and sacred music. Mr. Kirkhope's Choir appeared on the following evening, in the Freemasons' Hall, George Street. The choir numbers seventy voices, and is excellently trained. Barnby's "The Lord is King," and Sterndale Bennett's "May Queen," were produced, the accompaniments being given by a string quartet, piano, and harmonium. The grand final chorus in Mr. Barnby's Psalm was splendidly sung. Mrs. Ellis and Messrs. Stevenson and Kirpen sang the solos in Bennett's Cantata, which, as a whole, was interpreted with marked success.

The first of the eleventh series of Concerts promoted by the Directors of the Choral Union took place in the Music Hall, on the 10th ult. Various improvements have been made in the hall in the way of ventilation, lighting, and accommodation. There was a crowded attendance, notwithstanding the increase in the charges for admission necessitated by a reduction of the number of sittings. The orchestra, numbering seventy performers, was conducted by Mr. Manns, Herr Robert Heckmann being the leader. A very fine interpretation was given of the Overture to "Der Freischütz," with which the Concert opened; Beethoven's No. 2 Symphony was, as a whole, excelto "Der Freischütz," with which the Concert opened; Beethoven's No. 2 Symphony was, as a whole, excellently played, and listened to with the closest attention or throughout. The composition of the band this season is Violin Concerto. His strength lies in expression apparently, but he by no means lacks power. Madame Minnie Hauk was the vocalist.

The second Concert of the Choral Union series took place on the 15th ult., when Schumann's Cantata "Paradise and the Peri," was performed. The work has been heard once or twice before in Edinburgh, but never till now with full orchestral accompaniment. Madame Valleria was to have taken the principal soprano solos, but owing to an accident, fortunately not very serious, her place had to be filled by Miss Marianne Fenna, who proved an excellent substitute. Miss Ehrenberg, Mrs. Goodlet, Madame Grener, Mr. Charles Chilley, and Mr. W. Ludwig, sustained the other solo parts in an eminently satisfactory manner. The choral singing was refined and tasteful. Mention may specially be made of the agreeable and precise rendering of the Chorus of Houris, "Wreathe ye the steps." Unfortunately, however, the orchestra, not kept sufficiently under control, played too strongly, at times, indeed, overpowering the voices altogether. Mr. T. H. Collinson conducted, and Mr. Charles Bradley acted as Organist.

The Saturday Evening Literary Institute Concert of the 13th ult. was much better attended than on the first nights of the series. A number of pieces were played by the select orchestra, led by Mr. Dambmann, who contributed a violin solo on Scotch airs. Miss Pillans sang some songs. Mr. Kirkhope's Choir repeated its performance of Barnby's "The Lord is King," and Bennett's "May Queen," on the afternoon of the above date, in Queen Street Hall, in aid of the Royal Infirmary.

Sir Herbert Oakeley gave an Organ Recital on the afternoon of the 18th ult., in the Music Class Room. Appropriately to the season, Sir Herbert played Klug's Advent Hymn, also a selection from Handel's "Messiah" and Spohr's "Last Judgment." In commemoration of the and sport's "Last Judgment." In commemoration of the births of Weber and Beethoven, occurring in December, 1786 and 1770 respectively, the Cavatina, "Und ob die Wolke," from "Der Freischütz," was sung by Miss Wakefield; and the chorus and march from "The Ruins of Athens," were played by Professor Oakeley.

A performance of Handel's "Messiah," was given in the Music Hall, on the 20th ult., by the Edinburgh Select Choir, which was increased to thirty voices for the occasion. Precision, steadiness, and correct intonation, marked the singing, though in choruses in which expression might naturally be most looked for, that quality was rather absent. The solos were for the most part carefully and sympathetically rendered. Mr. Henry Hartley conducted, and Mr. John Hartley accompanied, with marked judgment,

MUSIC IN GLASGOW.

A PERFORMANCE of "The Messiah" was given by the Rutherglen Choral Union, on November 26, conducted by Mr. C. Bryce; and "Samson" was produced by the Glasgow South Side Choral Society on the following evening. The latter performance was, as is not unusual with this Society, vigorous, rather than refined. Mr. McKean, the Conductor, did not, moreover, seem to consider the orchestra as under his charge, consequently numerous points in the accompaniment were missed or badly taken.

A "Service of Sacred Music," as a Church Concert is frequently termed here, was held in Pollokshields United Presbyterian Church, on November 28. Sir A. Sullivan's "Festival Te Deum" was the chief item in a somewhat indiscriminately selected programme, and unfortunately it received anything but a perfect interpretation as far as the choir was concerned. On the same evening the Kyrle Society gave a Concert in connection with the Bazaar, in aid of the Sick Children's Hospital, when Anderton's "Norman Baron" and Jensen's "Feast of Adonis" were my love yon lilac fair," and "Wandering Willie," were in the programme. In both melodies the Scottish style has been successfully caught, while the harmonies are charac-

An Organ Recital and Concert of Sacred Music took place on the 4th ult. in the Established Church, Pollokshields, of which Mr. Alfred Heap is the Organist and Choirmaster. Mr. Heap played Guilmant's Grand Chorus in D major, and Mr. A. McColl (a young pupil of Mr. Heap), gave a very promising performance of Mendelssohn's Sonata in C Minor, besides accompanying the choir in the rendering of several well known anthems.

In Woodside Established Church, on the same evening, the Choir, consisting of boys' and men's voices only, made a generally successful appearance in a selection of anthems, &c. Mr. W. J. Clapperton conducted.

On the 6th ult., the Carl Rosa Opera Company completed a fortnight's engagement in the Royalty Theatre. Except on one or two of the nights the house was not very well-filled. Boïto's "Mefistofele," and Millöcker's "Beggar Student," attracted the largest audiences.

The opening Concert of the Choral Union series of Choral and Orchestral Concerts took place on Tuesday, the 9th ult., under the most promising circumstances. The programme was headed by the Overture to "Der Freischütz," which, as is the general opinion, never before received a finer and more poetic interpretation in Glasgow. The strings are superior in quality, I think, to those of any previous orchestra, and the wind instruments are of like excellence. Herr Robert Heckmann made a first rate impression as a violin soloist, alike in Bazzini's showy Concerto, and in Handel's noble Sonata in A. Herr Heckmann's tone is clear and pure, his technique is admirable, and he plays with great taste. His qualities as a leader were less evidently seen. In this latter respect there has been indeed room for improvement these last two or three seasons. Madame Minnie Hauk was the vocalist of the evening.

The first Saturday evening popular Concert of the series took place on the 13th ult., when there was the usual large audience. The chief items in the programme were the Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," by Berlioz, the Scotch Symphony, by Mendelssohn, a Concerto for Cello and Orchestra, by Eckert, the principal part in which was played by M. Lasserre, and the Overture to "William Tell," the latter a great favourite at the popular Concerts. The band, as a rule, was more completely under command than it was on Tuesday, and the tone and style were entirely satisfactory. Mdlle. de Lido, a clever mezzosoprano vocalist from the Imperial Opera at St. Petersburg, who appeared here some six years ago at one of the Orchestral Concerts, sang the aria "Caro nome" from "Rigoletto," "The Last Rose of Summer," and a Bohemian air, the last mentioned in the Russian language.

The Oratorio of "Elijah" was performed at the second Subscription Concert on the Tuesday following. The Choir was excellent, the alto part a little light, perhaps, but the treble and tenor bright and telling, and the bass, what the Choral Union bass nearly always has been, round, full, and deep. The Baal choruses, and the noble climax to the first part, "Thanks be to God," were noble climax to the litst part, Thains to the expression sung with due vigour and precision, but the expression imparted to such numbers as "He, watching over Israel," was a feature calling for special praise. The principal was a feature calling for special praise. The principal vocalists were Madame Valleria, Miss Ehrenberg, Mr. Chilley, and Mr. Ludwig, several members of the Choral Union assisting. The orchestra could not have played better than it did, being well under command. The greatest praise is due to Mr. Manns for his skilful conducting of the Oratorio, but the labour bestowed on the training of the chorus by Mr. Macbeth must not be overlooked. There was a crowded attendance.

The second Orchestral Subscription Concert, on the 23rd ult., comprised Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" Overture, the No. 3 Leonore Overture of Beethoven, and Mr. F. Cowen's "Cambrian" Symphony, the latter conducted by the composer. The Andante in A minor from Beethoven's String Quartet (Op. 59, No. 3), played by Herr Heckmann's Cologne Quartet, and the Pianoforte Concerto in A of Schumann (Herr Rummel, solo pianist), were the other chief numbers in the programme.

The Saturday evening programme of the 20th ult. included Beethoven's Symphony No. 4 in B flat. Mr. Cowen was the Conductor for the evening in place of Mr. Manns, and in compliment to him, doubtless, though not less on the merits of the music itself, the selection comprised a number each from his "Scandinavian" Symphony, and Suite de Ballet, "The language of the flowers"; also the Lullaby for strings from the Suite, "In the olden time:"

On the following Saturday evening the first half of the programme consisted entirely of extracts from Wagner—the Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," Orchestral Introduction and "Elizabeth's greeting to the halls of her ancestors," Introduction to the third act of "Die Meisterancestors, Introduction to the third act of "Die Meister-singer," and Walther's prize-song, transcribed for violin, "Voices of the Forest" ("Siegfried"), and the "Ride of the Walkyries"; and as dessert succeeds the more solid parts of dinner, there followed the "Clock" Symphony of Haydn, a Trio for violin, viola, and cello, and the "Dance of the hours" (Ponchielli).

The Hillhead Musical Association gave a Concert on the 18th ult., in the Oueen's Rooms, when Mendelssohn's "Loreley," and Sullivan's "On shore and sea," with some part-songs, &c., were performed. I have heard the Society to much better advantage than on this occasion. Mr. Hoeck conducted, and Miss Hetta Lipmann accompanied on the piano. On the same evening the Crosshill Musical Association, under Mr. Patterson, produced Cummings's "Fairy Ring," and sang, as a rule, with taste and precision. Mr. Hopper accompanied.

I may add to this rather lengthy letter that the first of short series of Choral and Orchestral Concerts in Paisley took place on the 11th ult., the programme being an orchestral one, and very nearly identical with that of the Glasgow Concert of the 9th. The attendance was not very good, but the projectors of these Concerts do not despair of ultimate satisfactory financial success.

At Dundee, on the 17th ult., the Oratorio of "Samson" was performed by the Dundee Amateur Choral Union, Mr. R. H. Turner conducting. The manner in which the Oratorio was produced was highly creditable to the Society. The soloists were Miss Annie Lea, Miss A. Ehrenberg, Mr. C. Chilley, and Mr. J. Bridson. The accompaniments Mr. C. Chilley, and Mr. J. Bridson. The accompanin were played by the Glasgow Choral Union Orchestra.

At Alexandria, in Dumbartonshire, the Vale of Leven Choral Society gave a Concert on the 18th ult. The chief numbers in the programme were Mendelssohn's "As the hart pants," and Macfarren's "May-day." The former was well rendered, with the exception of the quintet, "The Lord hath commanded," where the accompanying male chorus was quite out of tune. The secular Cantata was sung with precision and effect. Mrs. Haden and Mr. A. Black were the soloists of the evening, and acquitted themselves admirably. A select band, under Mr. Cole, accompanied, and Mr. J. Love conducted with much

MUSIC IN AMERICA. (FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

New York, December 12, 1884.

THE musical season has opened in the principal cities of the United States in a manner which is full of promise to the progress of the art and its votaries. The centre of activity is New York, though the coming of Herr Gericke to take charge of the Symphonic Concerts, in Boston, has profoundly moved that city which lays claim to being the intellectual and artistic centre of the country. There is one marked difference, however, between the two cities. New York is much more cosmopolitan in taste than Boston, and has an artistic equipment far more complete and admirable. For years the metropolis has tacitly conceded a superiority in choral music to the New England capital; but within a brief period the energy fermerly devoted almost exclusively to the cultivation of instrumental music here has been extended to choral music as well, and the city now boasts of two choirs, respectively conducted by Mr. Theodore Thomas and Dr. Leopold Damrosch, each of which numbers about 400 voices, while another of the same numerical strength co-operates with Mr. Thomas in the Concerts of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society. The rivalry between the chorus and oratorio societies has had a most stimulating effect upon choral music, and New Yorkers are no longer willing to yield the palm to the venerable Handel and Haydn Society of Boston, which, through many decades, has stood for the highest and best in the country. In the matter of instrumental, or, to be more exact, orchestral, music, there has never been a basis of comparison between the cities; Boston, in spite of the fact that it has maintained two orchestral societies, in a fashion, having, nevertheless, always depended upon New York musicians for noteworthy performances. The generous and public-spirited policy of Mr. Higginson, and the energetic labours of Mr. Henschel, have done much for Boston, and Herr Gericke's musical talent, supported by the same long and willing purse, will advance the city a great stride during this and the coming seasons; but it is not within the bounds of probability that the city will be able to measure herself with New York in this department of the control of the self-way of th

This subject of orchestral Concerts having a particular interest just now in London, it may not be amiss to state the condition of affairs in New York. The city unquestionably contains as many orchestral players of the first class as any of the European capitals. On this all the local Conductors are agreed. These musicians have all that they can do during this season, and though we have only begun, it is already safe to say that not one of the enterprises, unless it be a new experiment but recently undertaken, will fail of ample material support. It was impossible for non-subscribers to the Philharmonic Concerts to secure seats two days after the public subscription was opened. Almost all the stalls in the Academy of Music, when the six Concerts are given, are held by subscribers year after year, and a day's neglect is sufficient to forfeit the privilege of hearing the series. The Symphony Society, under Dr. Damrosch, has largely built itself up on the overflow from the Philharmonic Society, and has never assessed its stockholders since its organisation in 1877, though its financial success has never been comparable with that of the older cooperation society. Both of these societies give six Concerts in the course of the season, besides the same number of public rehearsals on the afternoons of the Fridays preceding the Saturday evenings on which the Concerts occur. There is no doubt that if the Philharmonic Society were to project weekly Concerts from the middle of November till the middle of April, every one would be attended by an audience as numerous as the large Concert-room would hold. There has been talk of doing this, but the Society is managed by a directorate of musicians who are exceedingly conservative, if not timid, in their business administration, and the suggestion fell through.

The Brooklyn Philharmonic Society has a different basis, being composed of amateurs who project a series of Concerts and engage the band along with the Conductor. Within the last five years it has shown unusual enterprise and has extended the scope of its activity in a marvellous degree. It has organized and sustains a choir which co-operates in its Concerts, and though it has thereby incurred large expenditures, it nevertheless has enjoyed such a measure of success that it has a snug reserve fund upon which to draw whenever in any season misfortune shall overtake it-an extremely improbable event considering that the subscriptions for this year reached 30,000 dollars before the first Concert was given. The Society, besides giving eight Concerts on a large scale and the same number of afternoon rehearsals, is trying the experiment of giving six Wednesday afternoon Concerts of miscellaneous pieces, the programmes of which, though considered light here, compare very favourably with those of the so-called classical Concerts of many European cities. Thus far, these matinées have been splen-didly patronised, and the managers of the Society are seriously contemplating an extension of their scheme next season, so as to double the number of their evening Concerts.

The season has added one to our regular orchestral enterprises which is yet in its experimental stage, but promises soon to emerge as a firmly established institution. The Arion, a German male chorus, having accepted last season the resignation of Dr. Damrosch, whom it brought over from Breslau, cast about in Europe for a new

Mr. Frank van Stucken, a young musician, of American birth, but European breeding and education. Mr. Van der Stucken had achieved some distinction as composer and Conductor in Germany, having been aided to a public hearing by Grieg and Liszt among the better known musicians of the old world. Like his predecessor in the conductorship of the Arion, he had hardly reached these shores last Spring before he felt the desire to stand before an orchestra. A highly flattering reception, which he won from the critics by virtue of some of his composi-tions (incidental music to Shakespeare's "Tempest"), suggested a plan which the energetic Germans whom he leads helped him to put into execution. He projected a series of four Novelty Concerts with public rehearsals. At these Concerts he purposes to bring out only new compositions, especially those of the school of young musicians to which he belongs; and his plan embraces one Concert devoted exclusively to American works. He secured a band of sixty of the best musicians in the city, practically the same band used by Mr. Thomas in his private Concerts, and has thus far given two Concerts which have been highly successful artistically. He has been enabled to give the first performances, on this side of the Atlantic, of Brahms's Third Symphony, Dvorák's "Husitská" Overture, and Sgambati's Symphony in D, all of which have since been taken up in the schemes of Theodore Thomas. His last Concert introduced works by August Klughardt, Gustav Holländer, Pierre Benoit, Adalbert von Goldschmidt, Giovanni Sgambati, and Emanuel Chabrier. Mr. Van der Stucken is still a young man, and his facility in score-reading and easy mastery of a band and choir, have led many intelligent students of music to conclude that he will prove the successor of Theodore Thomas, when that admirable Conductor is obliged to put down the work he has performed with great honour for twenty years. Before I leave this branch of the subject I ought to add that besides these Orchestral Concerts, we also have a short series of Saturday afternoon popular Concerts, under the direction of Mr. Thomas and the patronage of a committee of ladies, designed to educate the musical taste of young people. This, if I am not mistaken, is a feature which was suggested by a similar enterprise in London.

Except by an extraordinary number of peripatetic companies devoted to operettas and light operas, nothing is doing in operatic matters outside of New York city. Here, however, the season has been crowded with significant incidents, the experiment of which London was, long ago, wearied, and which resulted last season in disaster to Mr. Abbey, being here repeated. New York is trying to support two operation companies, one Italian and one German. The season is hardly sufficiently advanced to enable one to forecast its outcome, but thus far the new institution seems to have decidedly the better of the contest. Except on the nights when Madame Patti sings, the Academy of Music shows a beggarly account of empty boxes. Mr. Mapleson has attempted since the arrival of Miss Nevada, whose reception was exceedingly cordial, to divide the four performances a week equally between them, but has been frustrated several times by the indisposition of Miss Nevada or her unwillingness to sing in the opera announced. The consequence is that within two weeks of the expiration of the full season Mr. Mapleson's forces seem utterly demoralised, and there is no certainty about any of his announcements. His company is about on a par with those of minor Italian towns, except for the possession of Madame Scalchi; and his repertory has thus far not shown a single variation from the old hurdy-gurdy list. The absence for a single season of Madame Patti from the Academy of Music, would, it now seems, give a quietus to Italian Opera in New York; and if in New York, in the United States. But it is idle to speculate on this point with the past history of Italian Opera here, and in London, States.

At the New Opera House, which was opened last year, affairs are pursuing a much more dignified and satisfactory course. Mr. Gye's tardy declination to accept the management of the house left the season of opera exceedingly problematical until midsummer, when energetic Dr. Dam-rosch, supported by a few friends, offered to attempt to carry out a season of German Opera. The offer was accepted by the directors, Dr. Damrosch sailed for Europe before the purpose of his mission was even suspected, and within three months from the sailing day he was back in the Opera House directing the preparations for the season, which opened brilliantly on November 17, with a company of German singers, including Frau Schröder-Hanfstängl, of the Hencey Cheral Association. November 180, 100 to the North-Bast Wind. Cantata for Chorus and Orchestra. German singers, including Frau Schröder-Hanfstängl, of the Frankfort Opera House, Frau Kraus, wife of Musik-direktor Seidl, Fräulein Marianne Brandt, formerly of the Royal Opera of Berlin, Herr Schott, whom Londoners know, Herr Robinson, of Hamburg, Herr Udrardi, and Herr Staudigl, the inheritor of a great name, in "Tannhäuser." Through the intelligent zeal of Dr. Damrosch, and with the excellent help of Stage-Manager Hock, of Hamburg, many of the best features of the German operatic stage have been transplanted hither, and the scenic pomp, excellent acting, perfection of detail, and dramatic fire which have characterised the performances of the troupe, have won the undisguised admiration of the writers for the newspaper press and the intelligent public. The magnitude of the house compels the restriction of the list of operas to grand works, and thus far "Tann-häuser," "Fidelio," "Lohengrin," "William Tell," and "Les Huguenots," have been given with admirable effect.

Outside of New York and Boston the greatest musical activity is seen in Cincinnati, where twelve years ago Mr. Thomas established the series of biennial musical festivals which have achieved universal celebrity. Preparations are there making for the Festival of 1885 at which the chief choral works will be Bach's B minor mass and Liszt's "Saint Elizabeth." The orchestral musicians of the city have this season organised a Philharmonic Society on the co-operation plan of the New York Society of similar name, and are giving a series of Concerts with good effect.

The death, two days ago, of Mr. Reuben Springer, a wealthy old citizen of the city, is a blow to one phase of the musical development of this city. Mr. Springer was the originator of the fund which gave Cincinnati the finest music hall on the Continent, and his gifts to art within twelve years have aggregated over 300,000 dols.

MRS. MEADOWS WHITE.

It is with the sincerest regret that we announce the death, on the 4th ult., of Mrs. Meadows White, wife of Mr. Meadows White, Q.C., and Recorder of Canterbury. A pupil of Sir Sterndale Bennett and Sir George Macfarren, Mrs. White-then Alice Mary Smith-as early as 1861 excited attention as a composer by a Quartet, which was performed at a trial of new compositions at the Musical Society of London; and since that time she has gradually achieved a fame which places her name at the head of female creative artists; no other, as far as we are aware, having written for the orchestra, both alone, and in combination with voices. Gifted with an exceptional musical faculty, Mrs. White, after her marriage, which took place in 1867, clung earnestly and lovingly to her art, producing in rapid succession Quartets, Symphonies, Concertos, Cantatas, and other important works, many of which were played by our leading Musical Societies. A list of the most prominent of these compositions, with the dates of their performance, for the accuracy of which we can vouch, will, we are certain, be read with much interest :

Hereford Festival. September, 1882.
Kingsley's "Song of the Little Baltung." Cantata for men's voices, with orchestral accompaniments. First sung by the Lombard Amateur Musical Association. 1883.

The three Cantatas last named are published by Novello,

Ewer and Co., the composer being the only woman whose name appears in their popular octavo series. We may also mention that these publishers have in the press a setting by Mrs. White, similar to that of the "Song of the Little Baltung," of Kingsley's Ballad, "The Red King." In addition to the works we have named, Mrs. White was the composer of many Songs, Duets and Pianoforte pieces, one of the most popular of which perhaps is the Duet, "Maying," for tenor and soprano; and she has left in MS. a second Symphony, the pianoforte score of the "Masque of Pandora," the Overture to which work has already been referred to, and a setting in Cantata form of Miss Bevington's poem, "The Valley of Remorse." could not select one from this voluminous catalogue of published compositions which bears not the impress of high artistic culture, and refined poetical feeling; and although based upon those classical models which the composer learned to love in her student days, not a trace of plagiarism can be detected throughout her works. It need scarcely be said that Mrs. White's high position in the musical world was most thoroughly recognised, for in 1867 she was elected an Associate of the Philharmonic Society, and in 1882 was chosen, as a representative artist, to present the testimonial to Mr. A. Manns. The news of her decease, at the comparatively early age of forty-five, and in the full possession of her powers, caused, as may be imagined, a profound feeling of grief amongst her fellow artists which, at the last meeting of the Royal Society of Musicians, found expression in an unanimous resolution to present a letter of condolence, on his bereavement, to Mr. Meadows White, whose valuable services, as honorary Counsel to the Society for many years, cannot be overestimated. We have here confined ourselves to the record of Mrs. White's labours in the cause of music; but her kindly nature, and estimable social qualities threw such a charm over the society in which she moved that her loss will be long and keenly felt, as much by a large circle of friends, as by the lovers of that art to which she devoted her too brief life.

We quote the following from the Times of the 22nd ult .: -"A complimentary dinner was given on Friday evening to Mr. F. H. Cowen by the Glasgow Society of Musicians, which has been recently established for the purpose of giving musicians and lovers of music an opportunity of meeting at regular intervals, on the Continental plan. There were over a hundred guests, including Sir James Bain, late Lord Provost of Glasgow, and Dr. Donald Macleod, and Mr. Cowen's health was drunk with Highland honours. In reply, Mr. Cowen remarked that he considered the principle on which the Society was founded an excellent one, enabling, as it did, musicians to meet and interchange ideas, perform and discuss new works, and cultivate each other's friendship and goodwill. He further expressed a hope that something similar would soon be started in London, where at present anything approaching esprit de corps among musicians is unknown.

"THE Rose of Sharon" is to be performed at the Royal Albert Hall on February 4; on the 7th of the same month in New York, under Mr. Theodore Thomas; and in Canada during the Spring. Other performances in the United Kingdom will be given at Newcastle, Nottingham, and Cardiff, during March and April; and about the same time at Glasgow, Dundee, and Arbroath. Several other Societies in London and the Provinces are also rehearsing the work.

Even to those who are not professed admirers of Mr. Browning's poetry, still perhaps a considerable number, the fifth annual Entertainment, given by the Browning Society, on November 28, must have proved highly interesting. It consisted of a performance of the dramatic sketch "In a Balcony," in which Miss Alma Murray acted the part of Constance with animation and grace, followed by a Concert, in which all the music was set to Mr. Browning's words. Mr. Edwin Bending, who conducted, supplied two items in the programme, the quintet called "The Boy and the Angel," and the duet "In a Gondola." The former seemed the more original and striking composition of the two, especially as regards the rhythm; but the latter met with more success and received the only encore of the evening. Both works were probably new to most of the audience, having been performed only once before, at the entertainment given last Spring. More familiar were Dr. Villiers Stanford's three "Cavalier Songs"; these were accompanied by the composer and taken with spirit; hence their force and definiteness of dramatic character was more thoroughly brought out on this occasion than at any previous performance we can remember. In advanced modern writing, of which these songs are excellent examples, the audience are at the mercy of the executant, and can hardly supply anything which may be wanting in his rendering. As regards another composition of Dr. Stanford's, performed for the first time at this Concert, a tenor setting of "Prospice," it would be difficult to express a decided opinion after a single hearing. It was taken at a high speed, and sounded rather like a tarantella for pianoforte, with occasional vocal exposition. Perhaps this is the only form in which Mr. Browning's concentrated and fragmentary lines admit of being set; at any rate, we must suspend our judgment till a second hearing of the piece. Among the other items of the Concert may be noticed the opening chorus, "Over the sea our galleys went," a spirited and vigorous piece of writing, by Miss Ethel Harraden; and two songs, "The year's at the spring," by Miss Cécile Hartog, and "A woman's last word" (somewhat after the form of Schumann), by Mr. Leslie Johnson. The principal share of the singing fell to Miss Kate Flinn, who acquitted herself throughout in a clear and finished style. The tenor music was satisfactorily assigned to Mr. Nichol and Mr. Joseph Tapley, and the baritone part of the "Cavalier" songs to Mr. Reakes and Mr. Bicknell Young. The vocal music was balanced by two instrumental selections, from Raff's Trio, Op. 112, and Mendelssohn's Trio, Op. 49. In these pieces Messrs. Langdon and Catchpole, and MM. Pollitzer and Albert took part. The book of words informed us that some of the vocal music performed was still in MS. We may express a hope that it will not have to wait long for publication.

THE Upton Choral Society gave the first Concert of its third season, in the Stratford Town Hall, on Thursday, the 18th ult. Gaul's sacred Cantata, "The Holy City," occupied the first part of the programme, the remaining part comprising a selection of songs and part-songs. The principal vocalists were Miss Ambler, Madame Osborne Williams, Mr. Henry Guy, and Mr. W. H. Brereton, each of whom met with a cordial reception. The choir sang throughout with much care, and must be congratulated upon its steady advancement, under the tuition of Mr. J. Proudman. The part-songs, "Say, watchman" (Sullivan), and "Sweet and low," deserve special notice. The instrumental parts of the performance were taken by Messrs. F. C. Kitson and G. B. Gilbert.

DR. LONGHURST, Organist of the Cathedral, presided at a metring in the Odd Fellows' Hall, Canterbury, on November 28, when Mr. J. S. Curwen gave an explanation of the Tonic Sol-fa system. There was a large and influential audience. Two boys, from a Board School in London, went through every variety of test. Mr. Walter Parratt, Mus.B., Organist of St. George's Chapel, presided at a similar meeting at the Albert Institute, Windsor, on the 5th ult., when Mr. Curwen and the boys also attended. On the 6th ult. Dr. Haydn Keeton, Organist of the Cathedral, presided at a third meeting of the same kind at Peterborough.

MR. CHARLES DOWDESWELL delivered a highly interesting and instructive Lecture upon Wagner's "Parsifal, at the Clapham Hall, on the 8th ult., at which the Rev. G. Forrester, vicar of St. Paul's, Clapham, presided. The lecturer commenced his address by a brief account of the ancient Greek drama, as it was presented in the days of Æschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides, pointing out at the same time certain similarities between their creations and those of the poet-composer of the nineteenth century. Reference was next made to the Miracle and Mystery plays of medieval times, and a parallel was drawn between them and the religious drama of "Parsifal." Comparisons were also instituted between the earlier versions of the "Parsifal" myth and the Bayreuth master's treatment of that subject. A vivid description was then given of the representations of "Parsifal" at the Bayreuth Theatre, during which the Introduction was rendered on the pianoforte by Mr. Stranders, and vocal illustrations were contributed by Miss Rolls and Messrs. Tapley and Walter Dowdeswell. excellent execution of these difficult excerpts drew forth great applause from an appreciative though critical audience. At the conclusion of the discourse a hearty vote of thanks was accorded to the lecturer for his able exposition, not only of Wagner's last effort, but also of those reforms in matters musical which it was the aim of the master to accomplish. The profits of the lecture were shared by the London branch of the United Wagner Society of Germany and the Church of England's Young Men's Society.

The second season of the Brixton Philharmonic Society commenced on Thursday, the 18th ult., when an excellent performance of Mendelssohn's "Athalie" was given in the Brixton Hall. The choruses were very efficiently rendered, under the able direction of Mr. Fred Walker, the solos being sung by Miss Marie Etherington, Miss Blanche Murray, Miss Pamphilon, Miss Annie Pamphilon, Miss Annie Buckland, and Miss Mary Mackway; the first and last named ladies especially distinguishing themselves. Mr. Alfred Izard (pianoforte) and Mr. John Jeffreys (harmonium) gave due effect to the accompaniments, and the lyrics were recited by Mr. Charles Fry. In the second part, songs were given by the above-named vocalists, and also by Mr. Courtice Pound and Mr. A. Ewens (Miss Buckland receiving a hearty encore for her singing in "The Lost Chord"), and Mr. Charles Fry's rendering of "The Charity Dinner" was warmly applauded. Schumann's "Gipsy Life" and Eaton Faning's "The Vikings," by the choir, completed an interesting programme.

The Potter Exhibition at the Royal Academy of Music was competed for at the Institution on the 15th ult., and awarded to Dora Bright. Examiners: Messrs. F. R. Cox, H. R. Eyers, Walter Macfarren, and Sir G. A. Macfarren (Chairman). The Westmorland Scholarship on the 18th. Examiners: Messrs. F. R. Cox, E. Fiori, and Sir G. A. Macfarren (Chairman); elected, Kate McKrill. The Balfe Scholarship on the 20th. Examiners: Messrs. H. C. Banister, F. W. Davenport, H. C. Lunn, E. Prout, C. Steggall, and Sir G. A. Macfarren (Chairman); awarded to A. H. Fox. The Hine Gift—for the best English ballad by students of the Academy under seventeen years of age—on the same day. Examiners: Messrs. H. C. Banister, F. W. Davenport, H. C. Lunn, E. Prout, and Sir G. A. Macfarren (Chairman); awarded to A. E. Godfrey. The Bonamy Dobree Prize—a purse of ten guineas, for violoncellists who are pupils of the Academy—also on the same day. Examiners: Messrs. A. Van Biene. W. E. Whitehouse, and G. Libotton; awarded to Ernest Burton.

MISS ALICE SEYMOUR gave her first evening Concert at Brixton Hall, on Wednesday, the 3rd ult. The bénéficiaire was assisted in the vocal portion of a well selected programme by Mdlle. Avigliana, Madame Worrell, Madame Edith Daniel, The Misses Layton, Mr. Arthur Thompson, Mr. Joseph Hay, Mr. F. Bevan, and Mr. James Budd. Pianoforte pieces were contributed by Fräulein Anna Vogt (Mrs. H. Clark), Miss French, and Miss Edroff, and a violin solo was played by Herr Karl Laible. Miss Seymour, who possesses a contralto voice of pure and sympathetic quality, sang in an excellent manner Gounod's "Entreat me not to leave thee "and Pinsuti's "Queen of the Earth," each being encored. Recitals were given by Miss Kellogg, and Mr. Michael Watson was the accompanist.

The thirty-fourth performance of new compositions by members of the Musical Artists' Society took place at Willis's Rooms, on the 6th ult. Of the three works of large dimensions presented, commendation can only be given to Mr. Aguilar's String Quartet in A. This showed not only high-class musicianship, but much effective writing, the Scherzo being particularly fresh and piquant. Mr. Farley Newman's Piano Trio in E flat, and Mr. Marshall Hall Bell's Piano Quartet in the same key, must be characterised as feeble and amateurish. A Romance in A for violin, by Dr. G. Tyson Wolff, nicely played by Miss Lucy Riley, deserves favourable mention; but the success of the evening was won by Miss Mary Travers, whose two songs, "May Morning" and "Careless and faithful Love," proved that the composer possesses ability of no common order. The latter is a remarkably charming song, and as it was well sung by Miss Cockburn the audience showed its delight by very hearty applause.

The Tufnell Park Choral Society, under the conductorship of the founder, Mr. W. Henry Thomas, gave the second Concert of the present (13th) season on Tuesday evening, the 16th ult., in the St. George's Church Room. The choir (about 100 strong) was supplemented by a small band. The works selected for performance were Beethoven's "Engedi" and Lloyd's "Hero and Leander." The former work has not often been heard of late, owing to the exceptionally high notes written for the principal soprano and tenor voices. The soloists engaged on this occasion, Miss Patterson (the Prophetess), and Mr. George Tyler (David), met the demands on their voices with perfect ease. Miss Daisy Bayley and Mr. Frank Walker were very successful in the duet in "Hero and Leander." The Concert concluded with one or two excerpts from modern Italian Operas, sung by the before-named artists. The accompanist was (as on former occasions) Mr. Frank L. Thomas.

A VERY successful Concert was given by the Paddington Choral Association on Friday, November 28, at St. Andrew's Hall, when Hofmann's Cantata, "The Legend of the fair Melusina," was performed. The soloists were Miss Margaret Cockburn, R.A.M., Miss Clotilde Kapfi, Mr. John Rentro, and Mr. Dudley Towers, who sustained their parts in a most artistic manner. The choruses were very creditably rendered. The second part of the programme was miscellaneous, and opened with a new four-part song, "Cloudland," written by the Conductor, which was well received. A feature of the Concert was Mrs. Herbert Chatteris's rendering of the Jewel Song from "Faust," and, in response to a unanimous encore, she gave Rossini's "Una Voce." Miss Cockburn was also highly successful in all her songs. The hall was crowded by a fashionable and appreciative audience. Mr. St. John Robinson conducted.

MR. TOBIAS A. MATTHAY'S Pianoforte Recital at Prince's Hall, on November 28, contained a programme of works so widely divergent in character as Brahms's Variations and Fugue, Op. 24; Liszt's Paganini Study, "La Campanella"; Chopin's "Berceuse," and the same master's so-called "Devil's" Scherzo. Mr. Matthay, who played the whole programme from memory, also performed Schumann's Phantasiestücke, Op. 12, Book 1; some smaller pieces by Liszt, Chopin, and Weber, and also introduced a work of his own—Seventeen Variations on an original theme in C—which was much applauded. Mr. Matthay's playing was the theme of general admiration throughout the Concert; and we must also mention the excellent singing of Mr. J. T. Hutchinson in three songs, one of which was a refined setting, by Mr. Matthay, of Byron's "There be none of Leauty's daughters."

The Annual Concert of the Violin Classes in connection with the City of London College took place on the 17th ult. The pupils, to the number of nearly fifty, gave, under the direction of Mr. Fitzhenry, a well rendered selection of concerted violin music. The vocalists, Miss Alice Bateman, Miss Mackay Robinson, Messrs. Edwin Bryant and Stanley Smith, were highly successful in their songs, and Mr. T. E. Gatehouse gave two violin solos, both of which were encored. Mr. Alfred Izard rendered all the accompaniments in a perfect manner.

THE Herne Hill Choral Society gave a performance of Barnett's "Ancient Mariner," conducted by the composer, at the Gresham Hall, Brixton, on the rath ult. The solo parts were well rendered by Miss Bertha Moore, Miss Alice Farren, Mr. Percy Palmer, and Mr. J. T. Hutchinson, the latter gentleman especially singing with much dramatic power. Mr. Arthur Clark presided at the pianoforte and Mr. Humphrey J. Stark at the organ. The choruses were admirably sung throughout. At the conclusion of the work the composer was, amidst much applause, presented by the ladies of the choir with a handsome bouquet of flowers. In the second part songs were well given by Miss Hughes, Miss Moore, and Mr. Percy Palmer. Miss Minnie Dunn contributed a pianoforte solo, and the choir, under Mr. Hutchinson's direction, sang "Little Jack Horner" (Caldicott) and "Gipsy life" (Schumann).

THE Concerts given by the Popular Ballad Concert Committee this month have been of more than usual interest, inasmuch as they have introduced on the 8th ult., at Bermondsey Town Hall, as the first part of the Concert, Handel's "Acis and Galatea" with the Popular Chora Society (about 80 strong) for the chorus, aided by a small string band led by Miss Kate Chaplin, and conducted by Mr. W. Henry Thomas. The Concert on the 15th ult. was at the Shoreditch Town Hall, when an efficient band, the principals being Messrs. Val Nicholson, Channel, Trust, and Howell, played several overtures, Handel's Largo, and Ambroise Thomas's Gavotte from "Mignon." Mr. W. Henry Thomas was again the Conductor. This Concert, like that on the 8th, included a few good ballads, sung by well-known vocalists, from among whom Miss Margaret Cockburn must be selected for special notice.

The Concert given by the students of Madame Sainton-Dolby's Vocal Academy for Ladies, at the Steinway Hall, on the 18th ult., was, on the whole, a gratifying success. The most important feature in the programme was the first scene of the second part of "The Rose of Sharon." which was charmingly rendered by Miss Hilda Coward, Miss Amy Foster, and Miss Waite, as the soloists, while the part-singing was remarkable for unity and delicate expression. Among the students who evinced great promise were Miss Hyde, Miss Foster, and Miss Mary Willis. The general programme might well have been a little more ambitious, the number of ballads being somewhat excessive. Miss Winifred Payne, a violin pupil of M. Sainton, manifested remarkable ability in two movements of Mendelssohn's Concerto.

The members of Fulkerson's Vocal Society gave their first Concert of the second season on the 12th ult, at Brondesbury Hall, Brondesbury. The feature of the evening was the rendering of Gade's "Christmas Eve," Miss Susie Fenn taking the alto solos. The second part was miscellaneous. Mr. Fulkerson, the Conductor, sang "Be thou faithful unto death" ("St. Paul") and two songs of Kjeruli's, which were redemanded; Mr. Chas. Copland was heard to advantage in "The Wanderer" (Schubert). Mr. Kiver, the accompanist of the Society, received an encore for his excellent rendering of a Rhapsodie by Liszt, and a violin solo was given by Mr. C. Egerton Lowe. The part-songs were very well sung.

THE Report of the Watford Public Library School of Music for the year ending September 30, 1884, announces a large increase in the number of students; and in consequence of the unmistakable signs of the future expansion of the Institution, the Council points out for the consideration of the Committee the question of altering and extending the present buildings. Two Concerts were given by the Choral Union Class during the year, the programmes including Schumann's "Paradise and the Peri," Beethoven's "Engedi," and several minor compositions.

THE Free Concerts at Westminster Chapel, James Street, Buckingham Gate, have been resumed during the past two months, the programmes consisting of pieces for the choir, interspersed with violin and organ solos. Artists well known in the musical profession are engaged on each evening. The Concerts, which will be carried on through the winter months, are under the direction of the Organist, Mr. H. C. Tonking, who presides at the organ, built by Willis and Co., at the cost of £2,000.

THE members of the Grosvenor Choral Society gave their 154th monthly Concert at the Grosvenor Hall, on Friday, the 19th ult. In the first part, Smart's "Bride of Dunkerron" was successfully performed, the soloists being Madame Worrell, Mr. T. P. Frame, and Mr. Thurley Beale. The second part consisted of a miscellaneous selection. The part music included "The Carnovale" (Rossini), "A Christmas Madrigal" (Ions), and Quartet, "The dance" (Otto). Mrs. T. P. Frame and Mr. George Winny presided at the pianoforte and harmonium respectively, and Mr. David Woodhouse conducted with his usual ability.

On the 23rd ult. a Concert, in connection with the Violin Classes, was given at the South London Institute, Camberwell New Road, under the direction of Mr. Fitzhenry. The members of the classes, numbering about seventy, gained much applause for their rendering of several arrangements for the violin. Mr. T. E. Gatehouse received an encore for both his violin solos, and the programme was varied by a selection of vocal and pianoforte pieces.

The 191st Monthly Concert, of the St. George's Glee Union, was held at the Pimlico Rooms, on the 5th ult. The chief feature of the programme was the Comic Cantata, "The Jackdaw of Rheims" (G. Fox). The soloists were Miss Mary Mackway, Miss Marie Belval, Mr. A. Montague Shepherd, and Mr. Theodore Distin, who likewise contributed songs in the first part. "Gypsy life" (Schumann), "The Dawn of Day" (Reay), and "Damon and Phyllis" (T. Distin) were also exceedingly well rendered by the choir. The pianoforte accompaniments were supplied by Mrs. Edmonds and Mr. F. R. Kinkee, and Mr. Joseph Monday conducted.

On Monday evening, the 8th ult., Mr. Sinclair Dunn, the Scottish tenor, assisted by Misses Fenn and Lawrie, gave an entertainment entitled "The Songs of Burns," at the Westbourne Park Free Concerts, to a large audience. The illustrations were given with much expression, and the "connective readings" were of a highly instructive character. Miss Fenn, besides singing one or two solos, was the accompanist, and Miss Lawrie rendered two songs with much effect. Herr Gustav Ernest accompanied a new Scotch song of his own composition, "The Auld Folks" (words by "Wetstar"), and played with ability a Scherzo by Chopin.

The second of Miss Alice Aloof's fourth series of Pianoforte Recitals was given at Brixton Hall, on Tuesday evening, the 16th ult. The subjects selected were in each instance excellently interpreted, and comprised Chopin's "Andante Spianato" and Grand Polonaise in E flat, Op. 92, Liszt's transcription of the "Spinnerlied" from Wagner's "Flying Dutchman," and, as a well earned encore, a Gavotte by Dupont. Mr. Ernest Crooke (violin) and Herr Otto Leu (violoncello) rendered valuable aid in the remaining instrumental items. The vocal music was efficiently sung by Miss Marian McKenzie and Mr. Horscroft. Mr. John Harrison accompanied.

THE annual performance of "The Messiah," in aid of the funds of the Royal Society of Musicians, took place in St. James's Hall, on November 28. The rendering of the choruses left much to desire, but the solos were well sung by Miss Thudichum (who took the whole of the soprano music, in consequence of the absence, through illness, of Miss Clara Samuell), Miss McKenzie, Madame Enriquez, Messrs. Kenningham, W. H. Cummings, Brereton, and Thorndike, and Signor Foli. The Conductor was Mr. Otto Goldschmidt, and Dr. E. J. Hopkins presided at the organ.

On Advent Sunday, Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" was sung at the Royal Military Chapel, Wellington Barracks, under the direction of Mr. Richard Lemaire, the Precentor of the Chapel. There was a complete orchestra of thirty performers, and the tenor solos were roug by Mr. A. Kenningham, of St. Paul's Cathedral. The choruses were rendered with much effect. A selection from "The Messiah" will be given at the chapel on Sunday, the 11th inst., at six p.m.

During the past month the well-known Table d'hôte at the Criterion has been accompanied by a selection of Glees, excellently performed by an efficient choir of men and boys, under the direction of Mr. R. Mackway. THE East Finchley Choral Society gave its first Concert of the Season in the Lecture Hall, on Tuesday, the 2nd ult. The first part consisted of Gaul's Cantata "Ruth," under the conductorship of Mr. J. H. Jeayes, the principal singers being Mrs. Mason, Miss Kelly, Miss R. Smith, and Mr. H. Prenton. The Choruses were sung with great steadiness and due regard to expression, the Wedding Chorus being encored. The Second Part comprised a selection of National Melodies, under the management of Mr. Greenslade. Mrs. Mason was encored for her rendering of "Robin Adair" and Mr. Prenton for "The Wolf." Miss Janes accompanied throughout with care and precision.

THE organ built for Abney Congregational Church, Stoke Newington, by Mr. G. J. Wainwright, of Jamaica Road, Bermondsey, was opened on Wednesday, the 10th ult., by Mr. Fountain Meen. The programme, which was well chosen to display the varied resources of the fine instrument, included Sonata, No. 2, Mendelssohn; Air, with Variations, Rea; Fantasia and Fugue, Merkel; Prelude, Chopin; Bell Rondo, Morandi; Canzone, Guilmant; and Overture, H. Smart. The choir of Union Chapel, Islington, assisted by Madame Ernst, gave a good rendering of Mendelssohn's 42nd Psalm, and Madame Ernst sang "Jerusalem" (St. Paul).

The members of the Euston Glee Union gave their second Smoking Concert at Euston Station, on Wednesday, the 17th ult,, when a selection of Glees, &c., was performed with much precision, especially "The long day closes" (Sullivan), "On the March" (Becker), and "I lov'da lass" (Reay). The songs were excellently rendered by the members, Mr. A. G. Waud, of the Watford School of Music, creating a marked impression by his spirited singing of Frank Moir's "Gold." Mr. S. Chapman accompanied with much skill, and the whole of the arrangements were under the supervision of Mr. Stephen Kilbey, the Conductor of the Glee Union.

MR. J. IVES, Mus. Bac., of Glasgow, has been appointed Professor of Music in the University of Adelaide and Organist of the City Hall, at a salary of £650 per annum. Mr. Ives was formerly Organist at St. Stephen's, Hulme. Some time ago he obtained a similar appointment at Anderston Church, Glasgow, and also occupied the post of Lecturer on Harmony and Musical Composition at the Athensum, in that city. Last year he graduated at Queen's College, Cambridge. The Adelaide appointment was decided by competition before Sir G. A. Macfarren, Dr. Stainer, and Sir Arthur Blyth.

Under the direction of Mr. G. B. Sharp, of the London Organ School and College of Music, a Concert in aid of the Brixton Orphanage took place in Loughborough Park Chapel, on the 17th ult. The programme, in which pianoforte music was prominent, was chiefly supported by pupils of the College referred to, including Miss N. Lidstone, Miss E. French, Miss Doughty, and Miss Twelvetrees, each of whom merited commendation. A violin solo was played by Herr E. L. Schüller, and vocal pieces were sung by Madame Edith Daniel, and Mr. W. H. Simon. Mr. James Broadbent acted as accompanist.

A LECTURE on Beethoven was given before a select and appreciative audience at St. Peter's Hall, Brockley, on November 25, by Dr. C. J. Frost, who discoursed upon his character, life, and works, and also played several illustrations from his pianoforte compositions, including the second movement from the Sonata in E flat, Op. 7; the Air, with Variations and Funeral March, from that in A flat, Op. 29; and second movement from Sonata in E, Op. 90. Vocal illustrations were supplied by Mr. H. J. Bromley, who sang "Adelaida," and Mr. H. C. Thomas, who sang "Creation's Hymn," "May Song," and "In questatomba."

On the occasion of the unveiling of the Memorial to the late Duke of Albany in Esher Parish Church, Mr. Falshaw, the Organist, played as voluntaries, "O rest in the Lord," at the commencement of the ceremony, and at the conclusion the Marche Romaine (Gounod). On the reception of the infant Duke into the church, the same performer gave the Allegretto ("Lobgesang") and "Lied ohne Wortt," No. 42 (Mendelssohn), and "Andante Pastorale" (Stephens). Several appropriate pieces were also sung by the choir at both ceremonials.

THE Kyrle Choirs, under the direction of Mr. Malcolm Lawson, gave a performance of "Elijah" in St. Saviour's Church, Southwark, on November 27. The soloists were Miss Amy Aylward, Mrs. Dean, Mr. R. Bennetts, and Mr. Albert Orme; Mr. E. H. Tarpin presiding at the organ. On the 4th ult. the same Society performed "St. Paul," in St. Augustine's Church, Bermondsey, the vocalists being Miss von Hennig, Miss Arber, Mr. Reginald Groome, and Mr. Albert Orme. Mr. William Tate accompanied on the organ.

MR. BODDINGTON SMITH gave his second annual Concert on the 11th ult., at the Hampstead Vestry Hail, to a crowded and fashionable audience. He was assisted by Miss Marianne Fenna, Miss Jeanie Rosse, Mr. Reginald Groome, Mr. Musgrove Tufnail, Miss Chaplin (violin), Mr. Boatright (cello), and Miss Nellie Chaplin (pianoforte). Mr. Reginald Groome's beautiful rendering of "The Requital" was undoubtedly the feature of the evening. The bénéficiaire gave the Moonlight Sonata with great feeling.

The members of the Lavender Hill Choral Society gave their second Concert this season at St. Matthew's Room, on the 16th ult. The programme, which was sacred, included a selection from "The Messiah." The soloists were Miss Watts, Miss Stammers, Mr. H. Kearns, Mr. Stanley Smith, and Mr. J. Ortner. The choruses were ably rendered, especially the "Hallelujah." Mr. J. R. Jekyll conducted, and Miss Bird and Miss Stark accompanied.

THE first number of the "Quarterly Musical Review," edited by Dr. Henry Hiles, is announced to be published on February 20, by John Heywood, Deansgate, Manchester. It is not intended that the Review shall be, in any sense, of the nature of a newspaper, or a record of musical performances; and the prospectus assures us that it will be "essentially modern and cosmopolitan in tone." It need scarcely be said that we wish every success to the undertaking.

The organ of St. Stephen's, Camberwell Gate, having been renovated and rebuilt in the chancel, was re-opened on the 17th ult. A shortened form of Evening Prayer was used, and the anthem was "To Thee, Great Lord" (Rossini), the organ being played by Mr. W. J. Varney, A.C.P., the Organist. Afterwards a Recital was given by Mr. E. Mills, Mus. Bac. (Oxon), Organist of Battersea Training College. Vocal music was also contributed with much success.

At the Concert of the students of the Musical College of Wales, recently held at the Albert Hall, Swansea, the Principal, Dr. Parry, delivered an address in which he earnestly advocated the necessity of close and diligent study in order to arrive at a satisfactory result in any branch of the art. Such lectures are of the utmost interest; and we are glad to find that the Principals of our Musical Institutions are now fully recognising their importance.

THE North London Choral Society gave the first Concert this season on Tuesday evening, the 16th ult., at the Junction Road Chapel, Sterndale Bennett's "May Queen" being the work selected. The soloists were Miss Agnes Maitland, Miss Amy Sargent, Mr. Reginald Groome, and Mr. B. H. Grove, Miss Gertrude Salmon being the accompanist. Mr. T. B. Levison conducted, and the performance was successful throughout.

SPOHR'S "Last Judgment" was given at St. John the Evangelist's, Waterloo Road, on the three Thursdays in Advent, after the Evening Service. The solos were taken by Master Warren, Miss May Huges, Miss M. Tunnicliff, Mr. Crawley, and Mr. Winton, the choruses being very creditably sung by the choir of the church. Mr. Henry J. B. Dart, Organist of the church, presided at the organ, and Mr. F. Gilbert Webb conducted.

A PERFORMANCE of W. H. Birch's Cantata, "The Wreck of the Argosy," was given in the Westbourne Park Institute, on the 9th ult., by the Westbourne Park Choral Association. The solos were well sung by Miss Fanny Perfitt, Miss Marian Castle, Mr. Frederick Williams, and Mr. Albert Walter; and the choruses efficiently rendered, under the direction of Mr. W. R. Phillips.

THE All Saints' (Clapton) Musical Society, under the direction of Mr. W. M. Wait (Organist and Choirmaster, All Saints'), performed Dr. J. F. Bridge's Cantata "Boadicea," on the 16th ult. Dr. Bridge conducted, and Miss G. E. Troutbeck, the libretitist, was present. Dr. Gordon Saunders's new Vocal Trio (in canone) was an attractive item in the second part of the programme. There was a large and appreciative audience.

MR. HERBERT STANLEY gave an Evening Concert at the Horns Assembly Rooms, Kennington, on Tuesday, the 2nd ult., when an attractive programme was well rendered. The following artists assisted:—Miss Larkcom, Miss Emelie Kelley, Mrs. Merton Clark, Miss Florence Wydford, Mr. Wakefield Reed, Mr. William Durant, and Mr. Thurley Beale; solo flute, Mr. W. B. Boddington; solo piano, Mr. G. W. Hallett, R.A.M.

A HIGHLY successful Concert was given by Miss Jessie Griffin at the Lecture Hall, Greenwich, on November 27. The bénéficiaire, who met with a hearty and well-deserved reception, was ably supported by Madame Florence Winn, Miss Ethel Winn, Mr. Charles Chilley, Mr. Stedman, and Signor Foli. Mr. Willing presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. Stedman's choir-boys sang the "See-Saw" Waltz. Mr. Jeffries accompanied.

We are informed by Mr. F. Pitman, the publisher of the Sacred Melodist, that a new series of this journal will be issued at the commencement of the year; the music, hitherto printed in the established notation only, being given also in the sol-fa notation on the same page. Several new features, in addition to the above, will be introduced, and the size will be enlarged.

The third annual Musical Competition at Stratford will take place in April or May next, on a day or days to be hereafter named. The prizes will be awarded for choirs, brass bands, quartet and solo singing, pianoforte, organ, violin, cornet, and composition, the judges, as before, being Messrs. W. H. Cummings, W. G. McNaught, and Ridley Prentice.

MR. RICHARD LEMAIRE gave his annual Concert at the Erith Public Hall on the 8th ult. The artists were Miss Mary Davies, Miss Marian McKenzie, Mr. Harper Kearton, and Mr. W. H. Bereeton; solo pianoforte, Mr. E. H. Lemaire; solo violin, Miss Lucy Riley. There was a large audience, by whom the efforts of the several performers were much appreciated.

On Tuesday the 9th ult., the monthly Organ Recital was given at the Stepney Meeting House by Mr. B. B. Barrett (Organist of SS. Peter and Paul's, Clerkenwell), assisted by a choir of 40 voices, under the direction of Mr. J. H. Metcalfe. Mr. Barrett's programme included selections from the works of Bach, Haydn, Gounod, Lemmens, Batiste, and Scotson Clark.

The fifth Concert of the present season, at the Kentish Town Institute, took place on the 2nd ult. The vocalists were Miss Emily Morgan, Miss Thompson, Miss Frances Rogers, Mr. Joseph Langman, and Mr. Edwyn Bishop. Miss L. Burke, L.A.M., and Mr. A. C. Schäfer were the accompanists.

A PIANOFORTE Recital will be given by Mr. A. Victor Benham, at Prince's Hall, on Wednesday afternoon, the trst inst. The programme will include Beethoven's Sonata (Op. 53), Schumann's Fantasiestücke, compositions by Chopin, Liszt, &c. Invitations may be obtained of Messrs, Brinsmead and Sons, 18, 20, and 22, Wigmore Street, W.

HERR ADOLF BEYSCHLAG, the Conductor of the Belfast Philharmonic Society has also undertaken the conductorship of the Queen's College Musical Society in that town. At the first Concert Jensen's "Feast of Adonis," Mendelssohn's "Grant us Thy peace," and a selection of old English Madrigals will be performed.

MR. AUGUSTUS TAMPLIN has been appointed, by the Ven. Archdeacon Dunbar, permanent Organist at his Musical Services, which commenced on Sunday, November 30, at Lancaster Hall, Lancaster Road, Notting Hill.

H.R.H. THE PRINCE OF WALES has been graciously pleased to accept a copy of Mr. Alfred Allen's new song "London."

A MEMORIAL WINDOW to the late Mr. James Henry Godding, which has been placed in Newbury Parish Church, was dedicated on the 9th ult. Mr. Godding was Organist and Choirmaster of the Church for nineteen years. The window is by Messrs. Hardman & Co., Birmingham.

MISS MINNIE HAILSTONE gave her first Pianoforte Recital at Brixton Hall, on Monday evening, the 1st ult., assisted by Miss Annie Matthews, Madame Raymond, Mr. James Budd, Mr. Albert Rowarth (violin), and Mr. Henry Gadsby (pianoforte).

THE Rev. G. W. Botham, Rector of Whittington, Chesterfield, has been appointed Secretary to the Derby Archidiaconal Choral Association, vice the Rev. W. H. Arkwright, who is leaving the neighbourhood.

REVIEWS.

G. F. Händel, sa vie ses travaux et son temps. Par Ernest David. [Paris: Calmann Lévy, 1884.]

M. ERNEST DAVID, the author of a very readable biography of Johann Sebastian Bach, published some two years since, has shown commendable industry in the compilation, so soon after, of the present pendant volume thereto concerning the life of Bach's great contemporary, Handel. This is, moreover, the first work on the subject ever published in France. M. Schoelcher's well-known "Life of Handel," though originally written in the French language, did not find favour with French publishers; while, in its English translation (by James Lowe), it has run through two editions, issued in 1857 and 1859 respectively. Unfortunately for the prospects of M. David's volume in this country, Mr. Rockstro's "Handel" anticipated its publication by several months; the two latest biographers of the master having been simultaneously engaged upon the same task. Very similar in their general scope as both these works are, Very each consisting of one volume, containing (allowance being made for difference of type) about an equal number of pages, the English work is that of a thorough musician who happens to be also an able and conscientious author, while M. David's is the production of an equally conscientious musical littérateur, who confines himself, either designedly or as a matter of discretion, to the merest generalities whenever the merits of this or that of this hero's works are to be considered, and who, moreover, is at a disadvantage when touching upon descriptions of English musical life and its traditions of the past century, as compared with those furnished by a writer so completely en rapport with that subject as Mr. Rockstro. We need not, however, further pursue a comparison of the two works which, under the circumstances, could not be altogether avoided. M. David, it is evident, intended his "Life of Handel" to be circulated as much in this country as in his native France. He, indeed, opens his prefatory remarks with a quotation from Grove's "Dictionary of Music and Musicians" (Part III., p. 257), indicating the desirability of the production of a Handel biography which should steer a middle course between the cumbersome lengths of Chrysander's as yet incomplete (German) work, and the rampant partiality exhibited by Schoelcher; and he has thereby implied the standard at which, in the present volume, he has aimed. We have already in the foregoing remarks sufficiently emphasized our doubts as to his success in this direction. But neither are we prepared to look upon Mr. Rockstro's "Handel" as anything more than a very able and valuable contribution towards a future and more comprehensive English biography of the great master.

It is a very different thing when we come to consider M. David's book as being virtually the first to introduce the life and artistic strivings of our Handel to the French musical public. Handel's works, even his sublimest and world-famed oratorios, are scarcely known in France, any more than those of his great rival, Bach, or those of the gifted disciple of both, Mendelssohn. In presenting to his countrymen an efficient and sympathetic life-picture of the two great masters of oratorio, M. David has not only earned the gratitude of earnest French amateurs, but has prepared the way for a more general and intelligent appreciation of their works in his country. This in itself is a worthy achievement. But from a mere literary point of view also M. David's book on Handel may claim a distinct merit. His style is concise and to the purpose; entirely free from the "exuberant verbosity" of his predecessor, M. Schoelcher. He marshals his facts in strict chronological order (though unfortunately without the aid of headings, or that of a detailed index) while the interest in his story never flags. The striking and even pathetic vicissitudes of his hero's career are here brought into due prominence. It is in the treatment of the historical background to his picture where the essential weakness of M. David's Handel-biography lies. In his description of the musical life of our metropolis during the earlier part of the past century, the author frequently fails to appreciate its salient features, and thus arrives at imperfect conclusions. In illustration of this, we will only instance the en passant treatment accorded by him to such an important event in the history of the English operatic stage as the first production of the "Beggar's Opera"; an event which exercised the most decisive influence, at the time, upon public taste in England generally, and upon the (at all events, temporary) fate of Italian Opera in this country in particular. It is not, however, necessary to dwell in detail upon the shortcomings of an otherwise most meritorious effort to introduce the life and works of George Frederick Handel to the French musical public. The author has, it must be admitted, been most painstaking and judicious in his selection, for his specific purpose, of the vast material at his disposal; and has, at all events, succeeded in gratifying the desire publicly expressed (and likewise quoted in the above preface to the present work) by his distinguished Paris colleague, M. Arthur Pougin viz.: "I am looking forward to the publication of a work upon Handel, a composer as yet so little known amongst us, which shall be equal in merit to that of M. Ernest David's 'J. S. Bach.'"

[Glasgow: J. Muir Wood & Co.]

THE above is, in brief, the title of a new edition of a collection of Scottish melodies published in Edinburgh, in 1848, familiarly known as "Wood's Songs of Scotland." That compilation had the advantage of being under the enthusiastic and skilful editorship of George Farquhar Graham, the author, it may be mentioned, of the article "Music," in the seventh edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica, and a musical antiquary of acknowledged authority. critical notes of the editor were a feature of the work, his skill in the interpretation of tablature enabling him to correct the numerous musical mistakes of previous annotators. Graham's annotations have in their turn been revised by the present accomplished editor, Mr. J. Muir Wood, one of the results of Mr. Wood's researches being the clearer establishment of the nationality of the airs, some of which have been proved to be certainly English, while others may be considered equally English and Scottish, as they belong to the Border Counties on either side. The editor asserts his right to include these airs in a Scottish collection, "on account of the beautiful poetry written for them by Scotchmen, and with which they are much more associated than with the original verses, now indeed known only to the anti-The melodies in the new collection are about two hundred in all. This is some forty fewer than in the first book, while, again, fully twenty songs (of only antiquarian interest), have been cast aside in favour of other airs which, if more modern, have at least received the stamp of popular approval. It is the fault of some of the older Scotch songs that their range is too great for ordinary voices, and that the intervals are not always very vocal, arising simply from the fact that the melodies were, as is very evident, composed for instruments and not for the voice. Some of the finest of our Scottish lyrics also have been wedded to very unsuitable music, as, for example, Burns' exquisite lines, "A rosebud by my early walk," which were set to the jig-like tune, "The Shepherd's Wife," and might have lived as a song had they been more happily mated to a melody. These defects have been remembered in editing the present volume, and songs to which they particularly apply are added, and that ought indeed to have had a place before, are the Jacobite song, "When the King comes owre the water," and the fine air (for contralto), "Tam Glen." The more modern songs have been, as a rule, well selected. "Caller herrin," clever, but apt to be vulgarized by Scottish vocalists, "The Rowan Tree," the words of both these by Baroness Nairne, "The Nameless Lassie" (music by the late Alexander Mackenzie, father of the distinguished composer), "Lucy's Flittin'," and "Bonny Mary Hay," are good instances of the taste and judgment shown in selecting—a somewhat difficult task. The piano accompaniments and symphonies in the early edition were by G. F. Graham, J. T. Surenne, Henry Dibdin, T. M. Mudie, and Finlay Dun, all now dead, and they have very properly been retained, for, as a rule, they show an excellent perception of the peculiar tonalities of the airs, as well as discretion in invention. The additional melodies have been harmonised by (the late) Mr. T. M. Mudie and Mr. A. C. Mackenzie, and Sir G. A. Macfarren's masterly arrangement of "Caller herrin" has been adopted. Mr. Mackenzie's accompaniments add a special value to the book as may well be sup-They show not only rare discrimination, but are unusually warm and glowing, and thoroughly original. Four of Mr. H. A. Lambeth's popular four-voiced Scotch song arrangements, "as sung at Balmoral," have been added, giving-what was not needed to commend this excellent collection to popular favour—the extra distinctive title, "The Balmoral edition."

Six Two-part Anthems for Ladies' or Boys' Voices. Composed by Myles B. Foster. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE Organist of the Foundling Chapel has hit upon a capital idea in composing these anthems. There are still many churches where, for divers reasons, a full choir is unattainable, but where on certain occasions some departure from the ordinary routine of chants and hymns would be welcomed, provided any suitable music were available. Here we have six Anthems specially adapted for Advent, Christmas, Lent, Easter, Ascensiontide, and Whitsuntide. Mr. Foster's style is essentially modern and melodious, and he does not disdain any lawful means of increasing the effect. The trumpet call in "The night is far spent, the pretty little pastoral tune in "There were shepherds," and the introduction of a line of the Easter Hymn in "Why seek ye?" are simple devices, but they are such as will appeal forcibly to mixed congregations. At the same time, there is no lack of genuine musicianly feeling, and therefore, in all respects, the anthems are well suited to their purpose.

Mendelssohn's Overture to "Ruy Blas." Arranged for the Organ by A. F. Delmar. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

We have always maintained that organ transcriptions should have a place by the side of music written for the instrument, provided only they are carried out in a musicianly manner. Mr. Delmar's arrangement of Mendelssohn's brilliant Overture is masterly. While he has preserved as much of the scoring as can be conveniently rendered by the hands and feet, he has avoided the mistake of overcrowding. Of course, the transcription is only intended for recital players, and to them it should be exceedingly welcome.

Maude Valérie White's Album of German Songs. [Stanley Lucas, Weber and Co.]

THE songs of this composer have so rapidly sprung into popularity that the present collection of vocal pieces to German words (with an English translation) is certain to meet with a cordial welcome. Miss White's style, although evidently based upon that of the German lieder, has sufficient individuality to enable us to assign her a place far above that occupied by mere imitators; and the Album now before us will most assuredly add to her reputation. All the songs are melodious, and treated throughout with an artistic feeling which cannot fail to win both attention and appreciation. Like most of the works of this school of writing, the pianoforte occupies an important place in the composition; but it is never obtrusive, and accompanists should sympathise with the composer in so essential a characteristic of her style.

Breathing. By Mrs. Carlisle. [Chappell and Co.]

THE authoress of this little book tells us that we have lost the art of breathing; and certainly, in support of her assertion, she writes sensibly enough, although, like most persons who have a pet theory, she exaggerates slightly the evil of which she complains. "It is not the air of Italy," she says, "which makes Italians sing; it is their mode of life, and their power to breathe the air of heaven." Here, at least, Mrs. Carlisle is in direct opposition to Dr. Moffat, who tells us that it is the air itself, and not the manner of inhaling it, which makes the Italians good vocalists. Although there is little new in this Essay—for tight lacing, improper clothing, and want of ventilation are subjects constantly treated of in our popular medical books—Mrs. Carlisle has stored up her experience on these matters to good purpose; and even those who do not agree with her will assuredly read her brochure with interest.

The Professional Pocket Book, or Daily and Hourly Engagement Diary for 1885. Published under the immediate direction of Sir Julius Benedict.

[Rudall, Carte and Co.]

The present issue of this Pocket Book presents no novel characteristics, a fact which may be accepted, we presume, as a proof of the feeling that no change is thought desirable. As the dates of the principal musical events in 1885, however, cannot be decided upon in the latter part of November, 1884, we think that it would be desirable to defer the publication of the work until a little later in the year; for we cannot but feel a sense of disappointment at seeing, for example, under the date of Wednesday, August 26—the first day of the Birmingham Musical Festival—the, to us, uninteresting announcement, "Plymouth Races."

FOREIGN NOTES.

The new Gewandhaus at Leipzig was inaugurated last month with festive performances extending over three days—viz., from the 11th to the 13th ult. The following was the interesting programme: December 11, Overture "Zur Weihe des Hauses" (Bethoven), Prologue written by Herr Rudolf Gottschall; Toccata and Fugue, D minor, for organ (Bach); Psalm 114 (Mendelssohn); Ninth Symphony (Beethoven). December 12, "The Messiah," (Handel). December 13, Symphony, E flat major, No. 3 (Haydn); Air from "La Clemenza di Tito" (Mozart); Violin Concerto, A major (Mozart); Overture "Leonore," No. 3 (Beethoven); Adagio from Violin Concerto, No. 6 (Spohr); Lieder, with pianoforte accompaniment (Weber and Schubert); Symphony, D minor, No. 4 (Schumann). Herr Reinecke most ably conducted the performances, he having been for the last twenty-four years the musical director of this world-famed institution. The new Concert Hall is a very handsome structure, and excellent in its acoustic qualities. Like the old and historical "Gewandhaus," it bears the time-honoured inscription—Res severa verum gaudium.

The sum of 300,000 marks (£15,000) has been handed by a music-lover, who desires his name to remain unknown, to the authorities of the Leipzig Conservatorium, to be expended in the erection of a much needed new building in connection with that famous institution.

The University of Leipzig has conferred the diploma of a Doctor philosophia et liberalium artium magister honoris causa upon Herr Carl Reinecke, the worthy director of the orchestra of the new Gewandhaus, in connection with the inauguration festivities of that institution.

During the month of November fifteen performances of opera took place at the new Leipzig Stadt-Theater, comprising that variety of more or less standard works which characterises the répértoires of similar art institutions in Germany. They were the following:—Lortzing's "Undine"; Marschner's "Hans Heiling"; Wagner's "Die Meistersinger"; Auber's "La part du Diable"; Meyerbeer's "Prophète"; Mozart's "Don Giovanni," "Le nozze di Figaro," and "Entführung aus dem Serail"; Weber's "Freischütz," "Euryanthe," and "Oberon"; and Beethoven's "Fidelio." At the old Stadt-Theater, Nessler's latest production, "Der Trompeter von Säkkingen" continues to be the principal attraction.

Messrs. Lucca, the Milan music publishers, have made a very flattering offer to Herr Staegemann, the director of the Leipzig Stadt-Theater, with a view to his undertaking an operatic tour with the personale of his opera in the leading towns of Italy. Wagner's "Lohengrin," "Die Meistersinger," and "Tristan und Isolde" were to have been the chief features of the undertaking. Herr Staegemann has, however, declined the offer both in the interests of the Leipzig public and those of the artistic development of the institution over which he presides; considerations which, in the director's opinion, outweigh the pecuniary advantages to be derived from such an enterprise. The Milan firm will probably have no difficulty in carrying out this project with another German company. Meanwhile, Herr Staegemann has certainly earned the gratitude of the music-loving Leipzig public.

An operatic novelty, in three acts, entitled "Hero," by Herr Ernst Frank, was recently produced, for the first time, at the Berlin Opera, with a moderate success. The orchestration of the work is generally considered as highly effective, while the defects of the text-book, supplied by Herr F. Vetter, are said to have greatly impeded the composer in doing justice to his undoubted abilities in other respects.

We have to thank the Leipzig Signale for the following humorous anecdote. During the recent first appearances, before a Viennese public, of Herr Pollini's "phenomenal" tenor, Herr Bötel, a well-known wag amongst the members of the Imperial orchestra remarked to the Hamburg impresario: "You have been fortunate enough in converting a cab-driver into a tolerable singer. It remains for you to accomplish another and equally meritorious feat for the benefit of the art." "What may that be?" enquired the sympathetic manager. "You should," was the reply, " induce some of our operatic singers to betake themselves to the honourable and useful profession of cab-drivers."

A second "Wagner Society" has just been instituted at Berlin, under the auspices of leading members of the aristocracy, military officers, and officials of high rank, the chief object of which will be to ensure the continuance of the annual model performances of the master's works at the Bayreuth Theatre. "From the possibility of such an organisation to the State recognition of the claims of the Bayreuth 'Festspiele,'" the Allgemeine Deutsche Musikzeitung hopefully remarks, "there can be but a few steps.'

A complete "cyclus" of Wagner's music-dramas, commencing with "Rienzi" and closing with "Götter-dämmerung," is planned by Herr Pollini at the Hamburg Stadt-Theater, for next month. The well-known restrictions as to "Parsifal" renders these interesting performances, of course, only relatively complete.

In connection with the forthcoming celebration of the two-hundredth anniversary of the birth of Johann Sebastian Bach, the German town of Köthen, where the giant master of polyphony occupied the post of capellmeister, from 1718 to 1723, is busily engaged in making preparations for the erection of a monument to the composer, to be unveiled on the 21st of March next. The colossal marble bust of Bach, intended for the monument in question, is the work of a very able local sculptor, Herr H. Pohlmann.

Relative to the death of Gustav Reichardt, referred to in our last issue, the German Dorfzeitung reverts to a fact not generally known in connection with the career of this unassuming patriotic composer. It appears that his world-famed setting to Arndt's political poem, "Was ist des Deutschen Vaterland," had brought him in the sum of about a sovereign from the publishers, and this identical gold-piece he afterwards forwarded, on the fiftieth anniversary of the publication of his song, to the promoters of the erection of a memorial to the poet Arndt on the island of Rugen. The original and honouring recognition of this suggestive donation, on the part of the veteran composer, consisted in the forwarding to him, by the committee of the Arndt monument, of an album containing the portraits of the German Emperor, the Crown Prince, Prince Bis-marck, Field-marshal von Moltke, and of Reichardt himself, accompanied by the inscription: "The 'composers' of the German Fatherland."

first time on November 30, at the Schwerin Hof-Theater, under the composer's direction. The performance was enthusiastically applauded, and repetitions of the work have since met with an equally favourable reception.

A new Opera, "Ingeborg," by Herr Paul Geisler, talented disciple of the Wagnerian school, was brought out on November 30, at the Bremen Stadt-Theater, with great success.

We have received the first few numbers of a new musicjournal, published at Dresden, under the title of "Das Orchester." We wish our young contemporary, which appears to be ably supported, every success.

An interesting volume on the subject of "Jean Jacques Rousseau as a Musician," from the pen of Herr Albert Jansen, has just been published at Berlin. We shall probably have occasion to refer to it more at length in our column devoted to Reviews.

A volume has been forwarded to us consisting of extracts from the literary writings of Richard Wagner, translated into excellent French by M. Camille Benoit, one of the champions of Wagnerian art in France. The selection made by the translator is a very judicious one, and should contribute not a little towards a better appreciation amongst our French neighbours of the personality and artistic aims of the poet-composer. The book is entitled "Souvenirs de Richard Wagner," and is published by Charpentier and Co., of Paris.

The subject of the desirability of the adoption of a universal musical pitch (diapason normal) upon the basis of that established in France since the year 1859, which was recently brought before the German Government by an influential combination of musicians and musical instrument makers, has also been represented lately as a matter of urgency to the Austrian authorities under the auspices of the "Gesellschaft der Musik-Freunde," of Vienna.

Herr Frappart, of the Vienna Hof-Theater, is engaged upon the production at that establishment of an historical ballet, illustrative of "the development of the 'Wiener Walzer' in Music and dance," from the time of Mozart, through Lanner and Strauss, to the present time. Popular and characteristic Viennese personalities, appertaining to these different periods, are to be likewise interwoven with this somewhat original and attractive scheme.

Herr Franz von Suppé has written a new one-act opera entitled "Die Matrosen" (The Mariners), which will probably soon be brought out at the Vienna Hof-Theater.

A great number of unpublished compositions by Robert Volkmann have been found among his papers, more especially two concert-overtures, a sonata for pianoforte and violin, and numerous vocal quartets and

A new opera by M. Théodore Dubois, entitled "Aben Hamet," the libretto of which is the joint production of MM. Detroyat and de Lauzières, was produced for the first time at the Paris Théâtre Italien on the 17th ult. Dubois is the successful composer of a ballet, "La Farandole," produced at the French Opéra two seasons ago, and the première of his new and more ambitious work had been looked forward to with much interest in the French capital. The following is the succinct account rendered of the work by a correspondent of the Daily News: " 'Aben Hamet' is pretty, delicate, softly sentimental, and presents analogies to certain effects of French landscapes, which are half veiled in summer mists. There are striking, and indeed sometimes startling passages which are more suitable to chamber or Concert performances than to the stage. The hero is the last of the Abencerrages, and loves Bianca de Santa Fé, which character was sustained by Mdlle. Calvé, a young and really charming singer, who received her musical education under the auspices of the Vicomtesse Vigier (née Cruvelli). Aben Hamet and Bianca have discussions about the merits of their respective faiths, which are the occasion for duos that are sweet and elevated in sentiment, but want that sacred fire of corresponding ones in Poliuto. As Washington Irving and Chateaubriand have made the story of Aben Hamet familiar as a household word, I need not repeat it. The scene is laid in the gardens of the Palace of the Alhambra, in which the grandson of Boabdil meets erman Fatherland."

The Paris press, we may add, speaks highly of the musical merits of the new work, and considers that it has materially enhanced the reputation of its composer.

M. Gounod's "Messe Solennelle" was performed on November 21, the day dedicated in the church-calendar to St. Cécile, in the church of St. Eustache, of Paris, the composer himself conducting the performance. The chorus consisted of the choir of that church, aided by choristers from the opera, the orchestra being that of M. Lamoureux. There was a crowded attendance, admission having been

M. Victor Wilder has completed his French translation of the book of "Die Meistersinger," which is said be a masterly one in many respects. The rehearsals of the work have already commenced at the Théâtre de la Monnaie, of Brussels, where its first performance, in the French language will probably take place towards the end of this month.

The new season of the Brussels Concerts Populaires commenced on the 7th ult., with a first performance of Brahms's Third Symphony, and of a Symphony-cantata, by M. Adolphe Mathien, entitled "Freyhia."

Committees have been formed both in Holland and Belgium for the purpose of aiding the funds now being raised in Germany for the projected Weber monument, to be erected at his native Eutin, in December, 1886, the centenary of his birth, to the world-famed "Freischütz" composer. It is to be hoped that a similar movement will be set on foot in this country, where the revered master's works have done much to elevate the popular taste for high-class operatic music, and where the final effort of his genius, "Oberon," was first brought out under the composer's own direction, shortly before the hand of death placed its untimely veto upon a career which had been distinguished by true and disinterested service to the art.

Herr Gernsheim, the gifted German composer, at present residing in Rotterdam, has accepted an invitation from M. Lamoureux to conduct the first performance of his second Symphony in one of the Paris orchestral Concerts, whereof

M. Lamoureux is the director.

The centenary of the death of the famous Padre Martini, the Franciscan friar, composer and author of theoretical works on music, notably of a "Storia della musica," was celebrated on the 4th ult. at Bologna. Signor Luigi Mancinelli conducted the festive performances, which opened with a production, at the church of San Giovanni in Monte, of the "Missa defunctorum" by that ancient master. On the following day, a discourse was delivered, by Professor Parisini, on Padre Martini's musical compositions, which was followed by such illustrations as a Symphony in B minor for stringed orchestra; chorus and quartet from the tragedy "Giovanni Giscala"; Sonata in G minor for organ accompaniment, all of which works have never yet been published. On the 9th ult. another discourse, treating of the merits of Giambattista Martini as an author and musical historian, was delivered by Signor Leonilda Busi, followed by the performance of a Gavotte for stringed instruments, an Ave Maria for three voices (with quartet accompaniment), an Adagio for violins and violoncellos, a Psalm, "Super flumina Babylonis," and a Sonata for pianoforte, all from the pen of the same honoured maëstro.

A new comic opera by the youthful Maëstro Tommaso Montefiore has been successfully brought out lately at the Teatro Niccolini, of Florence.

At the Imperial Italian Opera of St. Petersburg, the Maëstro Ponchielli's Opera "I Lituani," under the altered title of "Aldona," has recently achieved a noteworthy success. Indeed, so enthusiastic was the attitude of the audience that, regardless of the physical fatigue involved saved the Philharmonic Society from the fate which awaits thereby, the composer was, according to the newspaper reports, compelled to appear before the curtain no less than

Herr Xaver Scharwenka, the eminent and sympathetic pianist and composer, has recently given a series of Concerts at the Russian capital, where he has been most enthusiastically received.

Fanny Elssler, the celebrated operatic dancer and successful rival of Marie Taglioni (whose death we but recently recorded), died at Vienna on November 27, at the age of seventy-three. She was the daughter of Johann Elssler, the copyist and frequent travelling companion of Joseph Haydn, and was born at Gumpendorf, near Vienna, in 1810. Elssler achieved her greatest and, as it appears to us in these days of the decadence of choreographic art, almost fabulous triumphs, some forty years ago, both in Europe and in America. But even the youngest among those who can remember her graceful performance may be said to have beheld her in the full possession of her charms. For Fanny Elssler, unlike many others in the theatrical profession, knew well when to retire from her brilliant career. She quitted the stage so long ago as 1851, and has since lived in quiet retirement in the Austrian capital, where she died.

Traugott Krämer, for many years musical director of the Coburg Opera, died at that town at the age of sixty-six. He was the composer of a number of highly meritorious orchestral works.

At Stuttgart died, on the 8th ult., Dr. Sigmund Lebert, a co-founder of the Conservatorium of that town, and well known as a most meritorious music teacher, and author of a number of theoretical works upon the art.

The death is also announced, at Leipzig, in the prime of her career, of Ida Beber-Theissen, one of the most highly-esteemed leading vocalists at the Leipzig Stadt-Theater. Frau Beber was a pupil of Madame Viardot-Garcia and of Professor Engel, of Berlin.

CORRESPONDENCE.

ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS IN LONDON. TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,-I have read with very considerable interest the remarks on this subject in your current number. As, however, the matter seems to be discussed from the point of view only of the Concert-giver, I will offer a few suggestions from that of the Concert-goer.

If very high prices do not necessarily cause failure, what does? I answer that it is a want of confidence in our orchestral conductors. To this fact may very largely be attributed the non-success of many musical undertakings. The same progress in musical education which has enabled audiences to criticise the works performed, has as surely led them to question the manner of their performance. Mr. Manns, at the Crystal Palace, and, more recently, Herr Richter, at St. James's Hall, have taught how great musical works can, and should, be presented. It is absolute faith in Mr. Manns that prompts music-lovers to make a tedious and expensive pilgrimage to Sydenham. Troublesome and costly as it may be, it is better, it is argued, to hear a symphony well done, occasionally, than to listen to half-a-dozen performances of an inferior kind. Precisely similar is the spirit which causes St. James's Hall to fill on the occasion of a Richter Concert, and yet the lowest charge for admission is half-a-crown, while the scale of prices for other seats in the hall is sufficiently high to ensure the speedy wreck of any enterprise, less satisfactory, artistically considered.

You, sir, in your article, have given prominence to the idea that time is required to form a public for Orchestral Concerts, much in the same way as has been done for the Monday Popular Concerts. But this is only true to a limited extent, or how else is the present position of the Philharmonic Society to be accounted for? With a service of over seventy years, a history unique, I believe, in this country, this antique body has fallen into such a melancholy condition, that by courtesy alone can it be considered our first musical institution. Length of service has not

Jeterioration; nor would it save the Popular Concerts, should the Directors be so impolitic as to attempt to carry on their enterprise with artists of lesser rank than those we are accustomed to.

I repeat, then, that, so far as I am able to judge, Orchestral Concerts in London are never likely to become a permanent success unless the conductorship is in the hands of some musician who possesses the confidence of the bulk of Concert-goers.

If we look further into the matter we shall find that this lifficulty is not one which is caused merely by sentiment or prejudice on the part of the public, but one which, from ime to time, presents itself in a very practical form to the lirectors of our various musical organisations. On the esignation of Mr. Cusins in 1883, the managers of the Philharmonic Society did not pursue the more usual course of at once appointing a successor, but invited some halflozen well-known musicians to occupy the post of "honoary" Conductor at one or more of the Concerts of their next series. Some have said that economy dictated this leparture from the ordinary course. It is more agreeable, nore dignified, and more creditable to the Society to suppose hat it arose from a genuine desire to find the best man. Mr. J. F. Barnett, Mr. Cowen, Mr. Mount, Mr. Stanford, each in turn presided at the Conductor's desk. lowever, seems to have recommended himself, for scarcely and the last season closed before it was announced that he choice of the management had devolved, not on one of he "honorary" Conductors, but on Sir Arthur Sullivan. Ine other example, and I will conclude. On the death of ir M. Costa last Spring, the direction of the most im-ortant of our provincial musical festivals fell vacant. apparently, without a moment's hesitation, the authorities oncerned appointed Herr Richter to fill the vacancy. hat English musicians accepted the position without any eal protest may be cited as evidence that even they are ot quite sure whether there be a second general amongst hem or not .- I am, Sir, your obedient Servant,

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—In your article on Orchestral Concerts in London, ou remark that the Royal Albert Hall is too large for his purpose. Respecting the suitability of the Hall for his class of music, I think it may be well to quote a efter which appeared in the Standard of November 17, as ollows :-

"With reference to the first performance of "Parsifal" in .ondon, it may interest some of your musical readers to lear how Wagner was impressed with the grandeur of the .lbert Hall, and with its peculiar fitness for the performance of great orchestral and choral works such as came up his ideal. In 1877, after his return from London, he said o me, in the course of a conversation: 'On entering the thert Hall for the first time it struck me at once as the cast ideal of a place for performing Beethoven's Ninth lymphony, in a manner and on a scale really worthy of he great master.'"

The opinion of the late Richard Wagner is worth having, nd I think most Londoners hold the same opinion with eference to the Hall.

With regard to soloists, any of the first rank, such as sually sing at London Concerts, can be heard perfectly in very part of the building, and all soloists could be heard, I they had not to sing against a band. Conductors all wer the country seem to think a soloist is a fair match for no orchestra!

As to the position of the hall, it must be remembered hat it is very difficult to fix on any part of London as cally "central." What is central and easy of access for me Londoner may be five or ten miles away from another.

The Albert Hall is situated in the best part of the West 5 and, and being only ten minutes' walk from the District alway (and two-thirds of this short distance is under sower, which is very convenient on rainy nights) the Hall more readily accessible than St. James's Hall.

The question of distance is not, however, of such importance as some seem to imagine; and a man must have a very feeble love of music who would be deterred from attending a Concert which he knows he would enjoy, because going to such Concert takes him fifteen minutes more than he thinks reasonable.

I am, Sir, your obedient Servant, 44, Chelsham Road, Clapham, S.W. LONDONER.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,-It is certainly high time that the reproach should be taken away from London of having no Concert-hall that will seat 2,000 people, while Bradford, Leeds, Birmingham, &c., have theirs, seating 4,000 and 5,000. No doubt hitherto the difficulty of providing a suitable site has been great. Will you permit me to point out that an opportunity will now arise of meeting that difficulty in the new streets that are at last to connect Charing Cross and Tottenham Court Road, and under which a railway connecting the North and South of London must sooner or later be carried. If such a hall were built at one of the points of intersection, near where a station is likely to be placed, and this hall could be let on moderate terms for instrumental and choral Concerts, meetings, &c., I feel sure it would be a success, and as a Limited Company with small paid-up shares, the capital would be forthcoming. I should like to say a word on the subject referred to so ably by Mr. Ganz. I have been for thirty years connected with musical associations. and know something of the financial difficulties attending those who make themselves responsible for Concerts, &c. The public knows nothing of this; but because a hall is full and the evening an artistic success, imagines that all is well. Often have I been asked the question, "What do you do with all the money?" when I have known that the committee was in fear and trembling for the financial result of the evening, and in doubt where to provide the means for giving the next Concert.

I am, Sir, your obedient Servant, George Maddox.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—I most cordially endorse the letter of Mr. James Walter Brown and your article on the same subject. Permit me to quote from a letter of mine, which appeared in the Guardian of March 3, 1880 :-

"It is a notorious fact that those who really keep up our musical services—the Minor Canons, Organists, and Lay-Clerks—are inadequately paid; and yet, if you take away the music from our Cathedrals, what will they be worth to the nation? In most cases they will not even afford the advantages of parish churches. In some instances the stipend of one Canon is equal to the aggregate salaries of all the Lay-Clerks, and is frequently four or five times that of a Minor Canon or Organist, and this in opposition to the provision of statutes and a modern sense of justice. If, then, the Commission should be unable to recommend a grant of funds from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for the worthy object of improving our national Church music, I would suggest, in the absence of any better plan, some reform in this direction—that, if the salaries of Canons cannot well be reduced, their number should be reduced, where there are fove or six, to four; where there are four, to three; not, of course, interfering with existing rights, but as a measure for the future."

Now, I happen to be acquainted with Mr. Brown, and can testify to his disinterestedness—he evidently writes simply in the cause of justice. His letter, like mine, states the broad fact that the men who do the work are not the men who get the pay. But I think he is mistaken if he supposes that Deans and Chapters will take steps to reduce their number without some very strong external pressure. For reduction of number means for them increase of attendance, inasmuch as there must necessarily be always one "Canon in Residence." But, even if this were not so, one "Canon in Residence." But, even if this were not so, the believe that Chapters care too little about the music to take the trouble to move in the matter. I may be wrong, but this is my impression, after holding office in three Cathedrals during the last ten years, and having opportunities of acquainting myself with the internal working of several others. Therefore I think that the reform must come from outside. The truth ought to be widely known and publicly ventilated. It is absolutely certain that nine-tenths of the public would care nothing for Cathedral Services if stripped of their music. We hoped the Cathedral Commission might do something for us, but we have been disappointed.

As far as I know it has done absolutely nothing for the cause of music, though many, like myself, sent reports of the existing state of things, with strong appeals for just consideration. So now it is to a musical public that we must appeal and look for reform. We want an outcry for justice that the standard of usefulness may have some weight in regulating the proportions of salaries. I could speak warmly (for I am interested) of the wrongs of Minor Canons who reside all the year round, are responsible for the bulk of all the services, and receive a fifth of what a Canon draws for three months' attendance. But one thing at a time; I recommend Lay Clerks to unite and get this matter brought under public notice. I agree with Mr. Brown that if it were only "taken up with spirit" it might "be brought to a successful issue."

I am, Sir, very faithfully yours, PRECENTOR.

CHORAL COMPETITIONS AT THE INVENTIONS EXHIBITION.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—I am requested by the Musical Committee appointed by the Executive Council of the International Inventions Exhibition, 1885, to beg a small space in your influential journal for the purpose of calling the attention of Choral Societies to the fact that it is proposed to hold choral competitions on an extensive scale during the forthcoming Exhibition. Substantial prizes will be awarded to successful competitors, and special arrangements will be made with railway companies for the issue of cheap tickets. Moreover, the comfort of the members of the Societies while in the building will not be overlooked. It is hoped that these choral competitions will serve the double purpose of encouraging choral music and also of offering to a large number of music-lovers in all parts of the country the opportunity of paying an inexpensive and pleasant visit to the Exhibition. Further details cannot at present be given, but, in the meantime, the Secretary, Edward Cunliffe Owen, Esq. (Inventions Exhibition, South Kensington), will be glad to receive, as soon as possible, provisional applica-tions from the Conductors or other representatives of Choral Societies .- I am, your obedient Servant, JOHN STAINER, Member of the Executive Council.

Want of space compels us to postpone until the next number, the appearance of several interesting letters on "Concluding Voluntaries," "Local Colour," &c.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

, Notices of concerts, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted. Our correspondents must specifically denote the date of each concert, for without such date to notice can be taken of the performance.

Our correspondents will oblige by writing all names as clearly as pos-sible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur. Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all Subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music is always kept in stock, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

J. O. Speaking broadly, the use of the Benedicite is a treastional, and especially English, manner of m vining the peniferical seasons, Advent being much on a level with Lent in this

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

ABINGON.—The Orchestral Society formed last June, under the Presidency of Sir Julius Benedict, gave an Invitation Concert, on Tuesday, November 25, which was very successful. The principal items in the programme were a Symphony by Haydn; Reinecke's Vorspiel to Manfred; and a violin solo by Mr. H. B. Wilsdon, Conductor of the Society. The vocalists were Miss Louise Phillips, whose singing was greatly admired; and Mr. H. Clarke. Mrs. Slade Baker played as pianoforte solo Liszt's "Muette de Portici," and also acted as a scommanic. as accompanist.

APPLERY, WESTMORELAND.—The members of the Amateur Musical Society, with the assistance of Miss Annie Dawson, and Messrs, Mahlon Firth and A. McCall, gave their fifth Concert on Tuesday, the 16th ult. The first part consisted of Cowen's Cantata The Rose Maidan, the performance of which reflected great credit on all concerned. The chorus of thirty voices had been well trained by Mr. D. Samuel, the Conductor. The second part was miscellaneous. The accompaniments were played by Miss Ridge.

BARNET.—The annual Grammar School Concert was held on the 18th ult., in the old Elizabethan Hall, which was crowded in every part. A miscellaneous selection of vocal and instrumental music was excellently rendered by the members of the Grammar School Choral Society, under their able Conductor, Mr. B. F. Columbine. The chief item was Sullivan's Trial by Jury (by special permission of D'Oyly Carte, Esq.), which was given very effectively, the pianoforte accompaniments being well executed by Mr. H. F. Gregg.

BARNSLEY.—On Thursday, the 11th ult., The Messiah was successfully given in St. John's Church by the choir. The soloists were Masters Charlton, Pickley, Wright, and Wildsmith (sopramo); Messrs. Charlton and Hinchcliffe (alto); Mr. Middleton (tenor); Messrs. Blackburn and Taylor (bass). Conductor, Rev. J. Thursfeld. Organist, Mr. J. Atkinson. The Choir numbered about 140, and included members of St. Mary's and St. George's, Barnsley; St. Thomas's, Worsbrodale; and several members of the Barnsley; St. Cecilia Society.

Blackhurn.—The members of the Vocal Society, under the conductorship of Mr. W. H. Robinson, gave their first Concert of the Tenth Season, on November 27. Mendelssohn's Lorsley and Hear My Prayer being the chief items in the programme. Miss Albu rendered the soprano music with excellent effect, and the choruses were given with due observance of light and shade. Miss Albu also sang "I Bacio," and "Lo! here the gentle Lark," with flute obligate by Mr. de Jong, who also contributed two flute solos. The rest of the programme consisted of contributed two flute solos. The rest of the programme consisted of vent season, under the conductorship of Mr. J. H. Rooks, of Bradford, in the Exchange Hall, on Monday, the 15th ult. Randegger's Fradois formed the first part of the programme, the soloists being Mr. J. Higginson (Blackburn) Miss E. A. Blackburn (Manningham), Mr. J. A. Broughton (Bradford), and Mr. John Nutton (Durham Cathedral), all of whom sang the parts allotted to them in a highly creditable manner. The band consisted of twenty-one performers, most of whom were selected from the orchestras of Mr. Hallé and Mr. de Jong. The choruses throughout the work were excellently rendered. The second part of the programme was of a miscellaneous character. The Concert was succeeded by a conversazione, in the course of which the choral members presented Mr. Rooks with a silver tea service, as a mark of their high appreciation of his services during the parts there exacton. the past three seasons.

BREON.—The members of the Philliammonic Society gave their second Subscription Concert in the Town Hall, on the 11th ult. The soloists were disconded to the theorem of the Society seasons of the Society seasons of the Society seasons of the Society. They were assisted by a string band. The chief items in the programme, which was well endered throughout, were Miss Wilson's songs, Mr. L. Waite's violoncello solo, and Fraulein Reiser's rendering of Chopin's Ballade in A flat for pianoforte. Mr. R. T. Heins conducted with his usual care and ability.—On the 18th ult. a Concert was given at Christ College, the principal feature in which was some excellent choral singing by the boys. The programme included "The Coronach," from Sir G. Macfarren's The Lady of the Lake; W. Macfarren's "The Belfry Tower," and "Chorus of Houris," for trebles and altos, from Schuman's Paradise and the Peri. Mr. Tuckwell, who conducted the concerted music, gave a good rendering of Schubert's "The Linden Tree," and an old English song, "Rouse thee, young knight."

Bernyroad—Mr. Harty E. Warner, Organist of the Parish

BRIGG.—On Tuesday, the 9th ult, the Choral Society gave a Concert in the Corn Exchange, which was filled by an appreciative audience. Acis and Galatea and part of Judas Maccabeus were performed by a band and chorus numbering nearly 100, the solos being taken by Mrs. Mason, of Coventry, Mr. A. Kenningham, of St. Paul's Catheda, and Mr. Jackson, of Lincoln. The band was led by Mr. E. Winter, and Mr. Jackson, of Lincoln. The band was led by Mr. E. Winter, leader of the Hull Harmonic Society's band. The Concert was under the direction of Mr. C. W. Cray, the Conductor, and was highly successful.

BRIGHTON.—On Saturday, November 29, Miss Augusta M. Draper gave her fifth annual Concert at the Royal Pavilion. The chief feature in the selection was a Sonata for Clarinet and Piano by Mendelssohn, which was kindly lent for the occasion by Sir George Grove. The performance of this work by Mr. Lazarus and Miss Draper was exceedingly fine. The other portions of the programme, interpreted by Miss Draper, her pupils, Miss E. Slade and Miss M. Graves, Madame Marie Klauwell, Signor Papini, and Mr. W. C. Hann, were excellently rendered. Mr. J. Crapps, F.C.O., accompanied. Liszt's transcription of Paganini a "Etudes" was brilliantly performed by Miss Draper, and the performance of her professional pupil, Miss Slade, was of unusual merit. usual merit.

BROMSOROVE.—The members of the local Philharmonic Society gave their first Sabscription Concert, on Tuesday, November 25. The their first Sabscription Concert, on Tuesday, November 25. The Society was Sports Lost Yudement, the soloists being Madenne Lila Jarratt, Miss Bailey, and Messrs. C. W. Fredericks, and Daniel Harrison. The Choir, under the leadership of Mr. W. H. Eston, the Society's hon. Secretary and Conductor, sang exceedingly well. The principals were highly efficient, and gave great pleasure to a crowded audience. A miscellaneous selection formed the second portion of the Concert, the choir singing several part-songs by Benedict, Pinsutt, and Bishop with great precision and effect. Mr. P. J. Griffiths and Mr. H. Clough ably accompanied at the pianoforte and organ respectively. The Concert was, financially and musically, a great success, and augure well for the Society's performance of Judas Maccabous in the early Spring.

BURY ST. EDMUNDS.—The Choral Society gave its first Concert for the present season, on the 16th ult., at the Athenaeum, when Handel's Oratorio Judas Maccabaeus was performed, the soloists being Miss Julia Jones, Mr. Bernard Lane, and Mr. Thurley Beale. The choir showed marked improvement both in quality of tone and precision. Mr. T. B. kichardson was an efficient Conductor. The band and chorus numbered 130.

CHARD.—The Musical Society gave its first Concert this season on the 10th ult. The first part consisted of Stainer's Cantata The Daughter of Jairns, which was satisfactorily rendered under the conductorship of Mr. W. E. Ellen, A.C.O. The solos were taken by members of the Society—Mrs. Powne, Rev. H. S. King, and Mr. J. E. Mansell. The second part was miscellaneous. The Concert throughout was a great succe CHELMSFORD.—The first Concert of the season, by the Musical Society, was given in the Corn Exchange, on the 9th ult, the works performed being Spohr's Last fluagment and Haydn's Spring. The band and chorus numbered about 120. The soloists were Miss Fusselle, Mrs. Layton, Mr. Holberty Hagyard, and Mr. A. J. Layton. The choruses were admirably sung. Mr. F. R. Frye, F.C.O., conducted.

CHENCESTER.—The rendering of Spohr's Oratorio The Last Judgment, at the Parish Church, on the 4th ult, was in every respect highly successful. The principal vocalists were Miss Julia Jones, Miss Emily Dones, Mr. John Hayden, and Mr. Thomas Kempton, and there was a full band and chorus. Mr. Edward Brind, Organist and Choirmaster, conducted with his usual ability. The work was preceded by an impressive address from the Rev. J. P. A. Bowers, minor Canon of Gloucester Cathedral.

Canon of Gloucester Cathedral.

CLekemannan, N.B.—The Tonic Sol-fa Association gave an excellent rendering of Sterndale Bennett's Woman of Sanaria, on the roth ult, in the Parish Church. The choir numbered sixty voices. Miss Cummings and Mr. A. Covie presided at the pianoforte and harmonium respectively. The solos were well sung by Miss J. Love, Miss M. Love, Mr. J. Love, and Mr. G. Fyfe. The second part was elected from the works of Mendelssohn and Handel; the most praiseworthy efforts of the choir being "As the hart pants" (Mendelssohn), "May no rash intruder," and "Let their celestial concerts" (Handel). Solos and duets were also contributed by Mrs. A. J. Robertson, Mrs. J. Millar, Misses Smart, Fyfe, and Mr. Love, and Mr. W. Love. Mr. W. H. Locker conducted.

COLDEBOOK, NEAR WINDSOR.—The Colibrook Choral Class gave a Concert in the Harlington Lecture Hall, on the 18th ult., on behalf of a Sunday school fund. The programme contained Solos, Trios, Quartets, &c. Mr. Richard Ratcliffe conducted.

The composer of this fine work has, even on a short for the first time. The composer of this fine work has, even on a short acquaintance, won abundant laurels in musical circles in England, and is looked upon as likely to occupy a much higher place in future. His Stabat Mater is a very remarkable production—a masterpiece in every respect. The treatment of the subject differs entirely from that of Rossini, Pergolesi, Palestrina, and others; it is, in fact, one of those works which stand apart, borrowing nothing from others either in conception or in structure. The solo parts were well rendered by Mrs. Jerome Murphy, Miss O'Hanlon, Miss Reid, Mr. Fitzgibbon, Mr. For in the subject of the Windowski the work, and might well form a subject for anxiety both to conductor and students, but it came offi not merely unimpaired, but with fullest measure of strength and beauty. The work was conducted by Professor T. J. Sullivan, and the accompaniments were well played on the pianoforte by Mr. C. A. Pridmore. The second part of the Concert was miscellaneous, and included pianoforte solos by Misses Reynolds, O Keeffe. Lambkin, M'Donald, and Gorsuch, and songs by Miss O'Connell and Mrs. Murphy, all of which were warmly received.

COVENTRY.—A special service, the feature of which was a rendering of Barnby's Cantata Rebeah, took place in St. John's Church, on November 25. The congregation was large, and the performance, as a whole, reflected great credit upon the Conductor, Mr. G. J. Robertson, who has aiready done so much to improve the musical service at St. John's Church. The preparation of a work like Rebehale by a Church Choir, with the service at St. John's Church Choir, with the hand in many places rendered efficient help, notably in the opening chorus, in the accompaniment to the music of Elizer (which was finely sung by Mr. Ward), in the Introduction to the second part, and in the March. Mrs. Mason sang the part of Rebekah throughout in a manner worthy of her high repute, and Mr. H. Clark was highly successful in the music of Isaac.—The performance of Handel's Judas Maccabaus by the Musical Society, at the Corn Exchange, on the sphilt, sutracted a large and most appreciative audience. The principal vocalists were Miss Mary Beare, Miss Garratt, Mr. Joseph Masa, and Mr. Lucas Williams, all of whom were highly successful. The chorus singing was excellent throughout, and great credit is due to Mr. Arthur Trickett for his able conducting on the occasion. Mr. F. W. Trickett presided at the organ. presided at the organ.

CUPAR, FIFE. -On Tuesday evening, the 16th ult., the members of the Choral Union performed Smart's Bride of Dunkerron. The soloists were Mrs. Smith, Mr. T. E. Dublin.—On the 7th ult, the "Acts" for the degree of Doctor in Music took place publicly in the Examination Hall of the University, which was well filled by an attentive auditory. The first piece performed was a setting of the Te Deum in E flat, for solo voices, and eight-part chorus and orchestra. Of this melodious, although short work, some verses were for voices unaccompanied, alternating with the fuller combinations. It was a somewhat unusual circumstance for a candidate graduate to appear in music in a triple capacity, capable of composing and playing a violin solo—playing it with pure intonation to—and then seating himself at the piano, and executing a piece by one of the greatest classical composers, both of which Mr. Carroll did after directing his Te Deum. In short, he won his laurels fairly in open court, and was congratulated upon the result by a numerous assemblage of the general public. Mr. Mahafiy and the Professor of Music were officially present.

FAREHAM.—The Choral Society gave a very good performance of Romberg's Lay of the Bell, on the 16th ult. The band and chorus, which numbered about ninety, were under the direction of Mr. F. Rutland. The solo singers were Mrs. Seymour Kelly, Mr. C. G. Pillow, and Mr. Seymour Kelly, who sang the part of the Master in a bold and spirited manner, displaying a fine voice and admirable style.

Folkestone.—The second of a series of Sunday afternoons for the people, instituted by the Rev. E. Husband, in connection with St. Michael's Church, took place on the 7th ult. The unusual course which the talented Incumbent of the Church has adopted has undoubtedly given rise to much criticism; but he has the satisfaction of knowing that there are hundreds who fully appreciate the result of his efforts. On this occasion, in addition to Mr. Husband's excellent recitals on the organ, two selections were performed by a septet of giolins; and the reverend gentleman delivered an eloquent address on the text. "I sit wrong to work on Sunday?" in which he warmly advocated the necessity of considering that relaxation and rest should be combined with intellectual amusement. The church was crowded in every part.—A successful Concert was given, on the 9th ult, in the Town Hall, under the direction of Miss Thereas Beney, A.C.O., Organist of Christ Church, in aid of the fund for the enlargement of the church, new organ chamber, &c. The programme included Caldictive hundred by the choir. The principal solo vocalists were Mrs. Fandl. Mr. Charles R. Ross and Mr. Church, and Mr. Dungey, Mr. Coffin's rendering of "Listening Angels" (T. Beney), Air and Duet "Come, ever smiling liberty" (Handel), given by the solo choir boys, and Mr. Eric Condy's rendering of Macaulay's poem "Horatius," were items worthy of special mention. Mr. P. V. Greenwood conducted with much ability.

Mr. P. V. Greenwood conducted with much ability.

GATESHEAD FELL—The members of the Amateur Vocal Society gave their annual Christmas Invitation Concert on the 20th ult. The principal work performed was C. H. Lloyd's Cantata Hero and Leander, the soloists being Miss Emma Thompson and Mr. T. B. Idle, who rendered the music allotted to them with great effect. The choruses were admirably sung by the choir. The beauty of the music and the absence of any great difficulties should make this Cantata a great advariety with choral societies. In the second part Miss Thompson and Handel's "Lascia chio pianga" and Tosti's song "Good-bye" (the latter encored), and Mr. Idle gave Handel's song "Droop not, young lover." The choir contributed part-songs, including Eaton Faning's "Song of the Vikinga," of which they gave a spirited rendering, and were consequently called upon to repeat it. Mrs. W. F. Horsley accompanied, and Mr. Rowley conducted. During the evening the President of the Society (Alderman Richard Cail) presented Mrs. Horsley with a handsome gold watch and chain, in recognition of her valuable services as accompaniet. Mr. Horsley, the energetic excretary of the society, responded on behalf of his wife, and a vote of thanks to Alderman Cail concluded the evening wife, and a vote of thanks to Alderman Cail concluded the evening.—The Glossop-Dale Philharmonic Society gave its second GLossor—The Glossop-Dale Philharmonic Society gave its second Concert for the present season on the 16th ult., when Mr. E. Prout's Cantata, Hereauad, was performed under the direction of the composer. The solos were admirably sung by Miss Eleanor Farnol, Miss Alima Hallowell, Mr. Selwyn Graham, and Mr. Musgrove Tufnail. There was a complete orchestra, by which the very important instruental effects were excellently rendered, and the choir sang as a whole admirably, especially distinguishing itself in the numbers in which force and vigour were required. The work was very warmly received by a crowded audience, and Mr. Prout was recalled at the close of the performance.

GRIESTON.—The Choral Society gave an excellent Concert on the 17th ult., before a large audience, when Handel's Acis and Galatea was effectively rendered by an efficient band and chorus. The solos were well sung by Miss Vinnie Beaumont, Mr. Brooks, and Mr. Brockbank.

OFFERTORY SENTENCES

TUNES FROM "THE HYMNARY"

BY J. POWELL METCALFE.

PREFACE.

There is an ever-increasing conviction that decency and order are better promoted by the singing than the saying of the Offertory Sentences—and that not only in our larger, but in our smaller churches as well. In the latter the adoption of the desired use is to a great extent prevented by the anthem character of the music employed in the usual offertory setting.

The following arrangements are more especially intended for the use of those choirs who, not being regularly trained in anthem-singing, are accustomed to rely on the tunefulness, form, and compactness of the bymn-tune for aid in fully rendering the words they sing.

FOR ATTACHING

Organ Pedals to a Pianoforte

Which Action he has, after continued study, brought to perfection, and gained the approval of Her Majesty's Commissioners of Patents. Letters Patent from the French Government have also been received by the Inventor.

ADVANTAGES OF WM. CHINNOCK DYER'S PATENT PEDAL ACTION.

TAIENI FEDAL ACTION.

It is not complicated; and as all the material used in manufacturing the same is well-seasoned mahogany, weights and springs not being used, it is warranted never to get out of order, and will last as long as any Pianoforte.

It is perfectly noiseless in its working, as it is carefully finished, and all the moving parts carefully bushed with red cloth. It is by far the easiest and most convenient Action for attaching Organ Pedals to a Pianoforte.

It does not in any way interfere with the Sound-board of the Pianoforte; and the Pedals belonging to the same need not be taken away, as is the case with other Actions.

It may be attached to any Pianoforte without the slightest injury to the same.

to the same.

The Action belonging to the Pianoforte is not in any way deteriorated, as the keys of the same are drawn down in the most natural manner at the place where they are played upon most natural manner at the place where they are played upon by the fingers.

A delightful and easy pedal touch is ensured, as the Action drawsdown the keys with the greatest case.

The notes respond to the lightest pedal touch.

"Dunsham House, Weston-super-Mare.
"I have minutely examined Mr. Wm. Chinnock Derk's Pedala and Action attached to a Piano, and find it in every way satisfactory. The points that strongly recommend his patent are:—

1.—Simplicity of Action, and therefore no liability of getting out of order.

—Quick and ready response to the lightest Pedal touch, so that all degrees of tone are readily obtainable.

—It is perfectly noiseless in working, which character, seeing that no springs are used and that all the centres are carefully bushed, it is likely to retain after constant use.

4.—Compared with the roller-board action—which hitherto I have considered the only satisfactory method of attachment—this new action is inexpensive, and it is not in any way less effective

"I believe it only wants to be well-known to become the general mode of attaching Organ Pedals to Pianofortes.

THE MUSIC COMPOSED BY

F. E. GLADSTONE,

Mus. Doc., Cantab.

Octavo, Paper cover, price 2s. 6d.; Vocal Parts. 6d. each. Full Score and Band parts may be had on hire.

"Dr. Gladstone having intended his work for church use, we expect to find the music solid in character, sober in expression, and liberally contrapuntal. In this we are not disappointed. . Flimsiness and tricky effect would be out of harmony with the spirit of English church music, and Dr. Gladstone has avoided both with indisputable success. . . . There is abundance of talent in the work."—Daily Telegraphs.

"Dr. Gladstone's music to the words is learned and clever without "Dr. Gladstone's music to the words is learned and clever without being abstructs or unvocal; on the contrary, the several numbers are so written as to bring their own interest both to the singers and to the hearers. . . With a view to enlisting the sympathies of those who listen to music for the immediate effect it produces, or for its ap-association with words, Dr. Gladstone has contrived his design most ably. It may, therefore, be recommended to the consideration of church choirs and choral societies with every confidence,"—Morning omposer expresses his thoughts in a clear and pleasing The voice parts are soberly and effectively written." manner.

"The purely religious style of Dr. Gladstone is admirably suited for the subject he has chosen; for although throughout the Cantata he has most sympathetically coloured the incidents of the narrative, in no part has he been betrayed into an ultra-dramatic setting of the events which would in the slightest degree unfit the work for the sacred locality which should be its natural home. . . . We heartily welcome so excellent a specimen of church oratorio as the one now under notice."—Musical Times.

THE HOLY CITY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"The work is an honour to English Art, and has elevated its composer into a place of distinction amongst native musicians."—Queen, "A good sound musical work is this 'Holy City.' I have no healtation in saying that it creditably represents English art, and does honour not only to the skill but to the judgment and taste of Mr. Gaul." Daily Telegraph.

"The reception was favourable in the extreme, and the Cantata must henceforth be classed among the successes which the Birmingham Musical Festivals have brought to light."—Standard.

"'The Holy City' is evidently the work of a thoughtful as well as a clever composer, and should make its mark among thoroughly English productions of a sacred character."—Musical Times.

"We hope and believe that the reception given last night to Mr. Gaul and to his 'Holy City' Cantata will prove an earnest of its popularity and acceptance throughout the length and breadth of the land."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

"A most interesting, tuneful, and scholarly work."-Manchester Courier.

"This fine work will considerably enhance Mr. Gaul's reputation as a musician."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

MUSIC BY ALFRED R. GAUL.

"Ruth' is a work of sterling power; its musical form is that of perfect tunefulness combined with simplicity and strength. There is nothing involved about it, nor the least straining after unattainable effects. The composer has grasped his theme in a thoroughly sympathetic manner, and has produced a work which is worthy of the subject... One of the sweetest numbers in the cantata is Kuth's solo, 'Entreat me not to leave thee,' which is instinct with pathetic expression... Boaz's solo, 'Go not from hence, my daughter,' is another effective number... A chorale, 'Nightfall,' is an exquisitely beautiful conception; and the intermezzo, 'Daybreak,' and the jubilant Wedding Chorus which follows, are full of spirit and vivacity, rushing forward with a joyous bound that carries the audience completely away. An enthusastic encore was given to the intermezzo and chorus."—Bradford Observer.

"That the idyllic story of Ruth is one admirably adapted for artistic lillustration is unquestionable, and poets, painters, and musicalns have over and over again made it a subject for the exercise of their talents, and we have no hesitation in saying that in its poetical and musical treatment by Mr. Oxenford and our townsman, it has been invested with increased interest. . . Pieces such as Mr. Gaul's Opus 34 are much wanted, and we believe that when the 'Ruth' Cantata is heard in our Town Hall it will be at once accepted as a valuable addition to our stock of music suitable for performance by fairly advanced and advancing societies."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

"Bright, tuneful, fresh, and musicianly—this work will be a great favourite, and will add to Mr. Gaul's reputation. The second part will be liked better than the first; it opens in the harvest-field, and here the real idyll begins, and with it the charm and grace and freshness of Mr. Gaul's inspiration. The maidens' chorus, bright as the morning it greets, and the men's robust and vigorous reply, well introduce the fresh and melodious joy-breathing music of Ruth, the chastened yet hopeful address of Naomi, and the hearty generous welcome of Boaz. blessings round us fall, which will beat comparison with anything Mr. Gaul has written. An effective fugal passage carefully worked out, but not overdone, is inserted between strains of joyful acclamation of considerable freshness and vigour,"—Birmingham Weekly Dart.

""Ruth' has been set to music by several composers; none, however, has become so worthly popular as the Cantata under notice. Although somewhat simple in parts it contains some charming music, and is highly characteristic of the story it so vividyl illustrates."— ""Hull of Howing melody,"—Salisbury Times.

NEHEMIAH

From the SATURDAY REVIEW.

"Mr. Josiah Booth's Oratorio 'Nehemiah, or the Re-building Jerusalem' (J. Curwen and Sons), is, judging from the pianofor score which lies before us, a work of considerable originality a merit, displaying much musical knowledge and artistic feeling on t part of the composer. It would be hardly fair, nor is it indeed possib to judge of the orchestral effect from a pianoforte score; but there nevertheless, sufficient evidence to show that the composer has ber fited by a careful study of the masterpieces of Handel and Mende sohn in this branch of musical art. Although there are no less th forty numbers in the work, it is not tedious, and there is no lack melodious writing and the recitatives, which too often are me masses of conventional padding, in this case are intelligent a characteristic. The work is divided into three parts, named respe tively, 'Preparation,' 'Labour,' and 'Rest,' in which the story of re-building of Jerusalem and the troubles brought upon the builde by their enemies, under the command of Sanballat and Tobias, narrated. The words have been very skilfully compiled by Mr. A Foxwell, who, although he has used the Scriptures largely, has al supplied some original matter. Among the noteworthy numbers a the opening chorus, 'Weep, Israel'; the trio, with chorus, 'Remembe O Lord, what has come upon us,' in the first part; the whole of t music for the 46th Psalm, 'God is our Refuge,' and especially t charming solo, 'There is a river,' and the last chorus, 'O sing un the Lord,' in the second part; and the chorus for youths and maider 'How stately the towers,' in the third part. The oratorio will ce tainly repay study, and will be a welcome addition to the programm of the many choral societies of the country.

CHALLEN & SON'S Iron-Frame Pianos

Have received the following Awards at the International Exhibitions of LONDON, 1862.—PRIZE MEDAL for "excellence of action and tone."

SOUTH AFRICA, 1877,—GOLD MEDAL for the best Pianette (the highest Award ever given for this class of Piano).

PARIS, 1878.—The MEDAILLE D'HONNEUR for "good and cheap Pianos" (great excellence combined with moderate cost).

MELBOURNE, 1881,—GOLD MEDAL for excellence of quality combined with solidity of construction.

TESTIMONIALS.

ANTON RUBINSTEIN.

Hawthorn Lodge, January, 1882. Having used one of your Pianos a great deal for studying music as well as singing, I can with pleasure testify to the fact that they possess a very fine tone and sustain the voice admirably. I have used Pianos by all the leading manufacturers, but I consider your instruments fully equal in every respect to any made, and I shall take every opportunity of recommending them.

Yours truly, opportunity of recommending them.

MARIE ROZE,

Prima Donna of Her Majesty's Theatre.

I consider that Messrs. Challen & Son have succeeded in providing, at a most moderate cost, Pianos of high-class workmanship and pure tone. The instruments exhibited by Messrs. Challen & Son in Paris were highly creditable, not only to them but to the English Section.

JOHN STAINER, M.A., Mus. Doc., Hon. R.A.M., F.C.O.,

English Juror at the Paris Universal Exhibition, 1878.

The Pianos of Messrs. Challen & Son possess every good quality. They are exceedingly moderate in price, and I can testify, from personal experience, to their great durability.

GEORGE GARRETT, M.A., Mus. Doc., Cantab.

I can testify, in the strongest manner, to the qualities of the Pianos manufactured by Messrs. Challen & Sow In every point as to touch and tone they are excellent; and I can also certify, from experience, as to their durability under hard wear.

W. H. MONK,

Editor of Hymns Ancient and Modern.

I hold a very high opinion of Messrs. CHALLEN & Son's Pianos. Their qualities of touch and tone can be at onc. estimated; but I can furthermore bear testimony to their great durability. They are in my opinion unsurpassed if no unequalled.

LINDSAY SLOPER.

CHALLEN & SON'S Pianos may be purchased on the Hire System, and obtained of all the principal Musicaellers throughout the World.

THE "BELL" ORGANS.

THE high standard of excellence maintained throughout all Organs manufactured by us, from the largest to the smallest, has created a world-wide demand for our Goods.

We will ask dealers not to compare our prices with those of any other Maker without taking into consideration the superior quality of our Organs; and if they do this they will find the BELL ORGAN not only the BEST IN QUALITY but the BEST VALUE IN THE MARKET.

Dealers save Wholesalers' profits in buying direct from us.

We make special Organs for export, and supply Catalogues in all languages, and as we always carry a stock of at least 400 Organs we can fill all orders immediately.

"I have much pleasure in stating that Mr. Ainsworth, of Chorley, Lancashire, has fitted to my Piano a set of his Organ Pedals and 'Perfection' Action, which are in every way most satisfactory. The superiority of his Patent over those I have already seen and used is most obvious.

"GEORGE THOMPSON, M.A."

H. HALTON, Mus. Bac., Kirkby, Liverpool, says:—"Mr. Ainsworth,—Having often thought I would like Organ Pedals to my Pianoforte, I, with that intention, inspected several Pedal Actions in London, some time ago, which, I need scarcely say, were quite unsuitable for the Pianoforte. I am glad I have availed myself of the opportunity of inspecting your Pedals and Action as attached to a Pianoforte. They are all that can be desired, and I am, therefore, pleased to give you an order for a set of 'B.Q.' Pedals and Action with Improvement 'Perfection' for instantaneous removal of Pedals, &c."

WM. CHINNOCK DYER'S

PEDALS AND ACTION

PATENT No. 2596 (1882)

PIANOFORTES

The Pedals and Patent Action supplied by the above well-known Inventor are giving a great impetus to the present generation of Organists and Students in the art of Pedalling, and, as it is well known that most, if not all, of our great Organ Players had the advantage of a Pianoforte with Pedals attached by the old and cumbersome rollerboard system, it should be known that by this new invention the Pedals can be purchased and attached at a small cost with a Mahogany Action which is perfectly noiseless, and without any springs or intricate parts to get out of repair. Organ music can thus be enjoyed and practised without the usual trouble and expense of an organ-blower. This invention is quite different to any other Patent Action, and, being the most recent, it is as great an improvement over others as the Steam Engine is over the old Stage Coach.

Send to the Inventor, as below, for the Drawings and Prices to the Profession and Trade.

DR. F. E. GLADSTONE says:-

"I have much pleasure in stating my opinion that Mr. WILLIAM CHINNOCK DYER'S Patent Action for attaching Organ Pedals to a Pianoforte is likely to prove very valuable to Organists and Students of the Organ.

"It possesses several advantages over other actions which have come under my observation, and I shall have no hesitation in recommending the invention to my friends and pupils."

All is sent complete, with full printed "Directions for Attaching," and the Action, being placed under the keyboard of the instrument, easily attached to any Pianoforte.

Set of Straight Pedals, 30 Notes (C to F), with Patent Action £6 15 0 Set of Radiating and Concave Pedals, 30 Notes (C to F), with Patent Action 7 15 0 Set of Straight and Concave Pedals, 30 Notes (C to F), as recommended at the Organ Conference, with Patent Action 7 15 0

Those who already have a Set of Pedals can be supplied with the Patent Action only 4 4 0 Agents are required in every Town. Apply to the Inventor and Patentee, as below.

Before purchasing, send to the Inventor for the drawings and prices of this the most recent Patent Pedal Action.

III.—ANTON RUBINSTEIN.
By Fr. Niecks.

THE subject of the present article differs no less from those of the preceding ones than these differ from each other. Sweet pensiveness we found to be the most prominent feature in Robert Franz's artistic character, and quick reflectiveness in Franz Liszt's; in Rubinstein's we shall find it to be fresh impulsiveness.

Anton Gregory Rubinstein was born on November 30, 1829, at the Moldavian village of Wechwotynez, in the neighbourhood of Jassy, near the frontier of the Russian province Bessarabia. Soon after his birth the family settled at Moscow, where his father established a pencil manufactory. The boy's love for music began to show itself at an early age, for whenever his mother, who was a good pianist, played, the little fellow took up a position near the instrument and watched and listened unweariedly. From his sixth year he received musical instruction from his mother, and in two years had made such progress that he was placed under Alexander Villoing, a pupil of Field's, and the best pianoforte teacher of the town.* Already in 1838-that is, in his ninth year-he made in Moscow his first public appearance as a pianist. A year later he went with his master to Paris. At a concert which he gave there in 1840, the boy of ten played compositions by Bach, Beethoven, Hummel, Chopin, and Liszt, and won the applause not only of the general public, but also of the many distinguished pianists that had come to hear him. Among these latter was Liszt, who congratulated the young prodigy, and encouraged him to study diligently, advising his master to take him to Germany, the most favourable ground for the development of musical talent. On leaving France, Anton Rubinstein visited first England, and then travelled very slowly homeward, stopping and playing here and there, by way of Holland, Germany, Denmark, and Sweden. Moscheles, who then lived in London, and heard him, mentions the "Russian boy whose fingers are as light as feathers and yet as strong as a man's" in his diary (1842), and does not hesitate to call him "a rival of Thalberg." Schumann, reviewing, in 1843, in the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, Anton Rubinstein's (Op. 1) "Undine," + a study for pianoforte, speaks of the young composer as "the talented boy who has already acquired a high reputation as a player." Let us see what the elder composer has to say about the youngest of his confrères. "Whether he has productive talent can neither be affirmed nor denied from the present achievement. That in the little piece the melodic element - without being exactly a beautiful melody—predominates, gives hope that he has begun to understand the true nature of music, and will develop in this sense more and more felicitously." Rubinstein returned to Russia in 1843, and played during the year's stay he made there at several concerts. After this he went with his mother and younger brother, Nicholas, to Berlin, as Moscow did not offer the advantages needful for the proper and full development of their talents. Meyerbeer advised Madame Rubinstein to place her sons under Professor Dehn. The advice was taken, and both Anton and Nicholas studied for two years harmony and counterpoint most assiduously under this learned theorist. Fétis relates that Anton Rubinstein told him one day that no sign of talent showed itself in him. "I had the will to write great things, and indeed undertook pianoforte concertos, operas, cantatas, and symphonies; but all this was only smirched paper." This is a startling revelation, not only because Nicholas never distinguished himself as a composer, but even more because one of the most striking qualities of Anton as a composer is his easy and copious productivity. A severe illness of her husband, soon followed by death (1846), recalled Madame Rubinstein to Moscow, whither her younger son accompanied her. Anton Rubinstein went to Vienna, and there made a livelihood by teaching. In the following year he undertook, with the flautist Heindl, a concert tour in Hungary. He then intended to go to America, but was persuaded to stay in Berlin, and there he remained, chiefly occupied with composition, till the outbreak of the revolution in 1848 induced him to betake himself to Russia. He chose St. Petersburg for his residence, and there for some years gave lessons and an annual concert. Of course, he was not idle as a composer. One of the works he then wrote, the Opera "Dmitri of the Don," composed in 1849 and performed in 1852, drew upon him the attention of the Grand Duchess Helen, who invited him to take up his abode in her palace of Kamenoi Ostrov. In 1854 he went once more abroad, and remained absent from Russia for four years. The Counts Wielhorski advised him, and their and the Grand Duchess's liberality enabled him to do this, their wish being that he should make himself known and perfect himself. Till the middle of 1855 he stayed in Germany, and then proceeded to Paris. England saw and heard him again in 1857. Rubinstein had ceased to be merely a promising youth, he now presented himself as a mature artist. On his reappearance in Western Europe he was at once, and unanimously, acknowledged a virtuoso of the first rank. "His prodigious execution," wrote a Parisian critic in 1857, "combines the force and impetuosity of Liszt and the delicacy of touch which characterised the playing of Chopin. No difficulty arrests Rubinstein. masters his instrument as a Cossack of the Don masters his full-maned, long-tailed horse, whose savage ardour he bridles at will." But, as the same critic remarked, he was not content with this, he aimed also at the reputation of a composer, and his ambition was of the highest. Rubinstein's activity as a composer was then, as it is now, truly prodigious. According to Fétis, he wrote between the years 1848-1857 fifty works, most of them of large dimensions, including four operas, the oratorio, "Paradise Lost," four symphonies (among which is the Ocean Symphony, one of his chefs-d'œuvre), six quartets, one octet, five fantasias, three trios, and three sonatas. On his return to Russia, in 1858, Rubinstein was appointed Court pianist, and soon after concert conductor. The Russian Musical Society, founded in 1859, chose him for director, and the St. Petersburg Conservatorio opened in 1862 with him as principal. In 1867, however, he gave up these posts, and made a concert tour, which resembled a triumphal procession; Berlin, Vienna, Paris, and London vieing with each other in their admiration of the great artist. This is not the time and place to describe Rubinstein's repeated concert tours in Europe, or that in America (1872-73), where he is said to have played in eight months at 215 concerts, and earned 351,000 dollars. Nor shall I attempt to give a detailed account of his subsequent public achievements in Russia. His private life too-he married in 1865, and has his home at Peterhof, near as it were, the unquestionably superior ones. In St. Petersburg—shall not be made a subject of dis-short, Rubinstein's case may be summed up in the cussion. But, besides his occasional appearances as conductor, more especially of his own works, outside of his own country, I must not omit to mention his brilliant generalship of the concerts of the Vienna Gesellschafts-Concerte during the season 1871-72. The Parisian critic quoted by me said that Rubinstein mastered the piano as the Cossack masters his horse, in the same way Rubinstein masters the orchestra. Indeed, there is only one thing he cannot master, and that one thing is his inmost self with its passionate impulses. However, let it not be thought that Rubinstein is a man all impulse and no reflection, all heart and no brain. Nothing could be farther from the truth. I found him, as, I think, all must find him who come in contact with him, one of the most thoughtful and best read musicians it is possible to meet. That his opinions and judgment are far above the common, those who have not enjoyed his conversation may gather, for instance, from his contribution to Joseph Lewinsky's "Vor den Coulissen," reprinted in the Signale (June, 1882, No. 38), in which paper (April, 1883, No. 32) may also be read some interesting notes on the difficulties of the execution of works of bygone times. The first-mentioned of these writings, I may say in passing, is a protest against oratorio and a plea for sacred opera.

The quantity of Rubinstein's compositions is enormous; this, however, is better shown by the titles than by the number of his works. To take only the most important of his operas, sacred and profane, tragic and comic (most of which do not bear an opus number), we have "Paradise Lost," "The Tower of Babel," "Dmitri of the Don," "The Children of the Heath," "Feramors," "The Demon," "The Maccabees," "Nero," "Kalashnikov, the Merchant of Moscow," "The Sulamite," and "The Parrot." And what a long list of symphonies, quartets, trios, sonatas, and the like extensive instrumental works! And then the almost innumerable pianoforte pieces and songs, single and in sets! Here we are chiefly concerned with the songs, and they alone shall be enumerated. The figures in parentheses indicate the number contained in the set. The first songs which Rubinstein published are the five single ones, Op. 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6, of the ten compositions which he afterwards cancelled. Since his new start in counting he had published the following sets of songs: Op. 1 (6), 8 (6), 27 (9), 32 (6), 33 (6), 34 (12), 36 (12), 57 (6), 72 (6), 76 (6), 78 (12), 83 (10), 101 (12), and 105 (a series of Russian songs). Along with these songs, for a single voice with pianoforte accompaniment, may be grouped the beautiful two-part songs Op. 48 and 67.

greatest pianist of living composers, the greatest composer of living pianists." This is pretty juggling with words. But, it will be asked, What about Liszt? Moreover, whether true or false, this epigrammatic judgment does not help us to see more clearly in the difficult question with which it plays, but rather complicates it unnecessarily. What position does Anton Rubinstein occupy among the great composers of our and of all time? That is the question one would like to have an answer to. I think he occupies a higher position in reality than in the opinion of the musical world, although this is by no means low. Some of the inadequateness of appreciation is attributable to the antipathy that exists between him and the Wagnerites (in connection with which his

the future historians would find it more embarrassing to draw Rubinstein's portrait than their predecessors found it to draw the portraits of Handel, Bach, Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven. For not only does the totality of the work of any one of these masters enable us to form in our minds a firmly outlined picture of his character, but even each single composition of theirs confirms the truthfulness of any intelligent picturing of this kind. But, he asks, how is it with Rubinstein? "Can a work like the 'Ocean Symphony' and the opera 'Feramors' have sprung from the same source?" Rubinstein reminds him of King Purmentor in a legendary tale of Kotzebue's, the august personage in question being a mighty giant up to midnight, but from the striking of that hour till sunrise a shrunken pigmy. If genius is the capacity of taking infinite pains, then Rubinstein is not a genius. Of course, this capacity of taking infinite pains is not genius, but it certainly is one of the constituents of genius, one without which the highest development of the artist and the noblest ideal of the art cannot be attained. Here we are touching a weak point in Rubinstein's artistic constitution. He seems to be always impatient to finish a thing. Hence the limited number of larger works that give unmixed pleasure. And what is the character of Rubinstein's style? One tells us that it is an offspring of Mendelssohn's, a second that it is related to Schumann's, and a third that it resembles Beethoven's. In fact, there is some kind of connection with each of these masters. Mendelssohn's straightforwardness in melody, harmony, and form, Schumann's warmth of feeling and colouring, and Beethoven's grandeur and vigour, may in turn and simultaneously all be found more or less in Rubinstein. Still it cannot be said that he is a follower of any one of them. He is an independent personality, one that rests on the broad basis of universality. In this respect he is the very opposite of self-contained individualities of the Chopin type. Narrowness, exclusiveness, and littleness of any kind are indeed foreign to his nature. Years ago I made elsewhere the attempt to sketch the artistic character of this remarkable artist. As I do not think I could do it better were I to do it over again, I shall transcribe a part of what I then wrote, not, however, without making some slight alterations:-"What strikes one first in Rubinstein's playing and in his compositions is an all-pervading freshness and air of inartificiality, which tell us at once that the outcome of the musician is a faithful reflection of the man. All is healthy and strong. The health seems to be indestructible, and the strength is Of Rubinstein it has been said that he is "the so exuberant as at times to burst out irrepressibly and tumultuously with a Titanic animality. Passages paradox: Less would be more. Ambros thought that in his works, and moments in his pianoforte performances, will no doubt suggest themselves to the reader. But the Titan who now ejaculates words of command or imprecation, who raises or hurls colossal rocks with superhuman strength, who grasps his enemy with iron hands, breathes out in the next moment his love in tender whispers, and caresses with more gentleness than hands of woman ever did. In short, a healthy manliness is the chief feature of his character. With the morbid, the vague, the dreamy, the transcendentally sensuous, he has dreamy, the transcendentally sensuous, he has nothing to do. He shows a predilection for great canvases and grand and simple subjects. He is less successful in miniature-painting, and in things that Hebrew origin has to be kept in mind), but for the require much attention to detail. This is not said in most part it is owing to the inequality of his work, ignorance of his short pianoforte pieces and songs, the mass of relatively inferior compositions swamping, many of which are very beautiful, but in which it is impossible to overlook his penchant for grandeur and The accompaniments, too, are of a simplicity that breadth. Then he rather walks the broad highways is dangerously akin to baldness. This, however, than explores the narrow by-paths of feeling. . . . Rubinstein belongs to no school, he is too independent for that; neither, I think, will he found a school, to do that he would require to have greater originality than he has (although that is considerable), or to be more of a mannerist. As the form of his countenance shows some similarity with that of Beethoven, so also does his character as expressed by his music. He has something of Beethoven's sweep, grandeur, and massiveness; but he lacks Beethoven's power of digesting, sifting, evolving, and ordering. He is not fastidious enough in the choice of his thoughts-he does not know how to wait for the happy moment, and hence we find in many of his works commonplaces side by side with noble thoughts. Indeed, he has published much that is unworthy of him, and only a few of his larger works attain that perfection of contents and form which satisfies all claims that may justly be made on a work of art."

Some of the above remarks seem to me to stand in need of explanation. Let me see if I can bring out my meaning with a little more precision. Delicate workmanship is not Rubinstein's specialty—he prefers fresco-painting to miniature painting*—still he has written many delicate little things, in which, however, sweet simplicity, rather than elaborate minuteness, prevails. And then with regard to his penchant for grandeur, it shows itself much more in the pianoforte pieces than in the songs. Indeed, these latter present themselves, for the most part, with a modesty and naïveness that contrast curiously with the bold heroism of most of the master's works, but are in accord with the nature of the artist who combines in his playing "the impetuosity of Liszt and the delicacy of Chopin." Breadth, rightly understood, is a quality which is nowhere out of place, and with this composer is noticeable in great and little things.

Rubinstein's songs are songs in the strict sense of the word. They have what Hauptmann said every song ought to have-namely, something of the nature of the folk-song. They are songs that can really be sung; whereas most modern songs can only be declaimed. I imagine the master sang them when he conceived them. They must have come welling up from the rich bourne of melody within him. In form they are sometimes strophic, sometimes throughcomposed; the composer evidences a preference for the former structure even where he employs the latter, for he generally respects the poet's formal disposition. But in the songs, as elsewhere, Rubinstein is unequal. In these short works the inequality does not of course show itself in one and the same composition. Every one, or almost every one, of the songs is melodious; not all, however, have that distinction which impresses the hearer; that flavour, that fragrance, that indescribable something which charms This circumstance makes a selection very desirable, and Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co.'s "Album of German Song," No. III., which contains twenty-five of the composer's best songs, is therefore a most welcome publication. + The editor, Mr. Hueffer, who has also furnished the translations, may be unreservedly congratulated on the happy accomplishment of his task of sifting; his selection is a real anthology.

In the early opus numbers-for instance, in Op. 1 and in Op. 8-there is a vein of melody that is flowing and natural, but, at the same time, commonplace.

soon changes; for whilst always remaining subordinate to the voice part, and, for the most part, unpretentious, the accompaniments become interesting and, in the noblest sense, effective. My favourite sets of Rubinstein's songs are three in number, and of these comes first and foremost Op. 72, six songs, the original German words of which are by G. von Boddien, Th. Storm, and C. Lemcke. Mr. Hueffer inserted no less than five of the six songs in his selection, and I, for one, shall not blame him for it. Another very fine set is Op. 34, the music of which Rubinstein composed to twelve of Bodenstedt's "Songs of Mirza Schaffy." These Persian songs (see "Album," pp. 29, 32, 34, 36, 38, 42, and 44) have a character of their own, and are of great piquancy. The third of my favourite sets is Op. 32, six songs of Heine's (see "Album," pp. 16, 18, 23, and 26), among which is the "Album," pp. 16, 18, 23, and 26), among which is the magic "The Asra." To come wholly under the spell of this composition, which, if one analyses it, seems insignificant, you must have the original German words, with their vague, romantic suggestiveness and exquisite perfectness of form. The specimens culled by the editor of the "Album" from Op. 33, 57, and 76, show that the beautiful songs of Rubinstein are not all contained in Op. 72, 34, and 32. Indeed, the selection might easily have been enlarged without weakening it. One song I missed with regret—namely, No. 7 ("Vernehmet ihr") of Op. 36, twelve songs translated into German by Bodenstedt, from the Russian of Lermontov, Poushkin, and the Countess Rostopchin. Among those songs of Rubinstein's I care least for I reckon foremost his settings of poems by Musset and Lamartine, Part I. of Op. 83. If I were to indulge in minute criticism I should not want interesting matter for discussion, in the Persian songs more especially—for instance, the long introductory and concluding symphonies of No. 10 ("The golden sun is shining"), which are respectively in E flat major and G major, whilst the song itself is in G minor; and the curious prelude, which forms the introductory symphony to No. 8 ("Bend, fairest blossom"). And how enthusiastically might I not expatiate on the beauty of my favourite songs—on the bewitching suavity of "The dewdrops shine" (Op. 72, No. 1), the piquant naïveness of "Like to a lark" (Op. 72, No. 2), the touchingly expressive simplicity of "Budding stands the Queen of Roses" (Op. 33, No. 2), and so on. Very interesting, too, would be a comparison of the settings of the same words by several composers; for instance Liszt's and Rubinstein's settings of Heine's "Du bist wie eine Blume" ("A flower thou resemblest"), and of Goethe's "Freudvoll und leidvoll" ("Clara's Song"). However, I shall spare the reader all this, and only say one word in conclusion. Before a final judgment can be pronounced on the composer Rubinstein, we shall yet for a long time have to flounder between the Charybdis of momentary impressions and the Scylla of chronic hallucinations; but even now I venture to assert confidently, without fear of contradiction from those acquainted with the matter, that the best of this composer's songs belong to the best that has been created in this genre.

II.

In February, 1835, the New Monthly Magazine printed the following letter which was subsequently reproduced in the Times, April 17, 1835.

"An inquiry was made through the medium of a late musical periodical if any information could be I given by its correspondents concerning the origin of

^{*} And even of scene-painting there is enough and to spare in his works. I say enough and to spare because it is to be found in what we may call easel-pieces, where it is out of place, being indeed rather the result of negligence than of judicious calculation. I Perhaps it will be asked: How is it that Rubinsian is numbered with the German song-writers? The anawer to this question will be: Because he wrote most of his songs to German words.

Handel's charming melody of 'The Harmonious Blacksmith,' and why it was so called. No reply seems to have reached the Editor, for we looked for it in vain. The following traditionary particulars may not be unacceptable. When Handel was at Cannons, the far-famed residence of the magnificent Duke of Chandos, near Edgware, he was one day overtaken in his walks by a heavy shower of rain. The great composer took shelter under a blacksmith's shop by the road side, where its laborious occupant was beating the iron on the anvil and singing at his work. The varying sounds of the falling hammer on the metal mingled with the rude tones of the man's voice, and entered into the very soul of the attentive listener. He carried home with him the feeling, the character, the inspiration of an idea admirable alike for the beauty and simplicity of its development, and gave us, for a 'rich' legacy, the notation of the few touching phrases which we have received under the name (bestowed upon them by himself) of 'The Harmonious Blacksmith,' an effusion the sweetness of which has drawn tears from many a gentle eye, and equally impressed with its melodious power the minds of the most refined musicians of Europe, for now nearly a hundred years; a composition, indeed, replete With image, music, sentiment and thought Never to die.

A visit to the truly unique and beautiful little sanctuary of Whitchurch, formerly the chapel built for the ducal mansion, and now used for parish worship, is well worth a nine or ten miles journey from town. It contains the organ upon which Handel played, during his occasional sojourns at Cannons, for four years; and a silver plate, inserted in the instrument, informs us that he availed himself of its aid while composing his majestic oratorio of 'Samson,' one of the finest of his works. Here is a true object of pilgrimage for the musical devotée!"

I have already, in my first, paper, refuted the have already, in my first paper, refuted the erroneous notion that Whitchurch was the chapel of Cannons, and also shown that the organ which stood in the Duke's Chapel was sold and re-erected in Trinity Church, Gosport, where it still may be seen and heard. I now propose dealing with that miserable myth which associates Handel with the so-called "Harmonious Blacksmith," mentioned in the foregoing letter. It may be well to note that the writer of the letter was at no pains to be accurate even in minor details, he speaks of a silver plate, which is, in fact, brass; and also cites Samson, whereas the inscription names Esther.

Unfortunately this letter attracted the attention of Mr. Richard Clark, one of the Choir of St. Paul's Cathedral and Westminster Abbey, who had a wonderful scent for hunting a false trail; his enthusiasm was commendable, but wanted the curb of knowledge and common sense, and it is to be feared that he was only too ready to be imposed upon, when in pursuit of a favourite hobby. Mr. Clark immediately visited Edgware, and by degrees made himself believe all the preposterous statements contained in the letter, and much more; the result of his investigations were introduced to public notice in 1836 by the publication of a folio pamphlet of twenty pages, entitled "Reminiscences of Handel," which included the music of the "Harmonious Blacksmith" (printed in gold), with a special staff containing the anvil part. more pitiable exhibition of musicianship it would be difficult to find. No one worthy the name of a musician could seriously entertain the notion that the stroke of a hammer on an anvil could by the utmost stretch of imagination be associated with Handel's air. But Clark did worse,-he set to work to discover the identical anvil, and persuaded his life and subsequently, has never had any change or friends to subscribe to put up a wooden memorial in the churchyard, over the grave of Powell, with the following inscription:-

"Sacred to the Memory of William Powell, the Harmonious Blacksmith, died February 27th, 1780, aged about 78. He was Parish Clerk of this Church many years, and during the time the immortal Handel resided much at Cannons with the Duke of Chandos. Erected by permission of the Rev. G. Mutter, free of expense, through the exertions of Richard Clark and Henry Wylde." Clark moreover placed the following on a house in

Edgware :-

"'The Harmonious Blacksmith.' In front of this house stood the Blacksmith's shop belonging to Wm. Powell, who was Parish Clerk at Whitchurch, where the immortal Handel was organist, in which shop he took shelter during a storm of rain. This house, now belonging to Mr. Tomline, the poulterer and pork-butcher, was Powell's dwelling house, and is upwards of 300 years old. The original Music and Account may be had within."

The "Music and Account" was sold at 10/- per copy, in order to obtain funds to "Keep up the painting, lettering, and repair of the board to perpetuate Powell's memory, until the principal and interest shall enable him (Clark) to put up a stone in the churchyard instead of wood."

Clark died in 1856, and it was not until 1868 that the large grave-stone was erected, which now obtrudes itself to notice close to the gate of the churchyard. The present inscription is not an absolute reproduction of its predecessor: it runs, "In memory of William Powell, the Harmonious Blacksmith, who was buried 27 February 1780, Aged 78 years. He was Parish Clerk during the time the immortal Handel was organist of this church. Erected by subscription May 1868." The first memorial gave the date of death as 27 February, the present says he was buried on that day. The first said he was aged about 78, the present gives it aged 78; at the head is a representation of an anvil and hammer, and also the notes of the anvil as printed by Clark:-

In 1720 Handel published an oblong volume, ninetyfour pages, with the following title, "Suites de Pieces pour le Clavecin, Composées par G. F. Handel." In the preface he says, "I have been obliged to publish some of the following Lessons, because Surrepticious and incorrect Copies of them had got Abroad. I have added several new ones to make the Work more usefull, which if it meets with a favourable Reception; I will still proceed to publish more, reckoning it my duty, with my Small Talent, to Serve a Nation from which I have receiv'd so Generous a Protection.—G. F. Handel."

On page 57 of this book we find the tune now known as the "Harmonious Blacksmith" but with the simple title "Air." The book was published in June, 1720, at which time Handel was living in London; probably he had not then even visited Cannons and Edgware: the Duke's chapel at Cannons, as we have seen, was opened in September, three months after the date of Handel's publication, and as the palace at Cannons was not finished for some time afterward, the Duke continued to reside in Cavendish Square; a pupil of Handel's, the Princess Amelia, resided close by. Handel was moreover a constant visitor at this period to the Earl of Burlington, whose house was in Piccadilly.

Handel's volume, frequently republished during his addition made to the titles of the various suites, the one under consideration has always retained the simple prefix "Air." It is absolutely certain that Handel never gave the name "Harmonious Blacksmith" to any piece whatever.

The first appearance of the air with the title "Harmonious Blacksmith" was about the year 1800, when Lintern, a fashionable music publisher of Bath, printed the air and variations with the taking title which has become so popular; whether the enterprising publisher had an eye to business in thus specially labelling a very taking piece is not clear. Lintern's own account (vouched for by the late Mr. Windsor of Bath, and Dr. Rimbault), was that his father, with a general love of music, professed an extreme partiality for Handel's air with variations, and he (the father) being a blacksmith by trade, the son published the music with the novel title as a mark of filial affection.

Possibly Julius Plumer, Esq., who placed the fabulous description on the organ in Whitchurch, may have met with a copy of Lintern's publication, and built up in his own imagination the absurd romance which afterward obtained such remarkable credence. In another case, which must now be mentioned, some such process must have taken place. In a volume entitled "Contributions towards a history of the ancient Parish of Prestbury, in Cheshire," by Frank Renaud, M.D., the author speaks of a certain Charles Legh, who married in 1733, and succeeded to his patrimonial estates on the death of his father in 1739. The author informs us that Mr. C. Legh "was a friend of Handel, who composed the 'Musical Blacksmith' whilst on a visit to Adlington (Cheshire). Mr. Legh had asked for an original composition whilst the two were out walking. The request was made when they were near to Hollingworth smithy, and whilst they walked home through the park Handel whistled the tune and afterwards wrote it down. The whole originated in the natural music made by the smiths whilst plying their trade." In 1882, this story was improved. In "Nooks and Corners of Lancashire and Cheshire" the author says: "Close by the station (Adlington) is the old smithy; as we go by, the smith is hard at work, the sparks fly merrily, and under the strokes of his ponderous hammer the anvil rings melodiously, as it did a hundred years ago, when, on a bright morning, Handel, whilst taking a constitu-tional with his host, Charles Legh, of Adlington, listened to it, and first conceived the idea of the 'Harmonious Blacksmith,' the score of which he wrote down immediately on his return to the Hall, where it was long preserved."

The facts already stated respecting Handel's residence previous to 1720, when he published his music,

The question remains, "Was the air now known as 'The Harmonious Blacksmith' Handel's own composition or did he merely compose the variations upon it?" There is not a tittle of evidence to show that the melody existed before Handel penned it. A few years since Wekerlin included in his book " Echos du Temps passe" a song entitled "Plus ne suis ce que j'ai été," the words by Clément Marot, the French poet, who died in 1545, to music almost identical with Handel's air, prefixing a note that "the music of the song is undoubtedly of later date than the poetry." He states that he found the song (music and words) in a book of songs by Moncrif. A notion soon prevailed that Moncrit's volume was an ancient one and a conclusive proof that Handel had stolen the "Air." M. Wekerlin thereupon wrote the following letter, which was afterward published by M. Schoelcher:— Handel's own compose "The collection of Moncrif (one volume in 12mo, will agree with my jupinted in 1757) is exceedingly rare, I know only two contrary be produced.

copies of it; one of which is in the library in the Rue Richelieu, the other in a private collection. It is beyond a doubt that the theme of 'Plus ne suis' is borrowed from the Pieces de Clavecin, by Handel, and that Moncrif committed a fault in not affixing the name of the author. Perhaps he was himself ignorant of it; for he was not very well acquainted with music. I only made this discovery after the publication of my book, otherwise I should not have failed to mention it in my notes.

I think this ought to satisfy all candid enquirers. The late Dr. Gauntlett includes the "Harmonious Blacksmith" tune in the collection called "The comprehensive tune-book," and boldly says it is taken from the Marot and Beze Psalter, but he gives no reference. I have searched for it in vain, but Mr. E. H. Turpin, who has devoted much time and research to the question, says "I have looked through a copy of 'Les Pseaumes de David mis en rime Françoise per Clement Marot et Theodore de Beze,' printed in Paris in 1662, and here give the melody to the 150th Psalm, which forms the basis of the statement regarding Handel's adopted melody." Mr. Turpin then argues that Handel may have been familiar with the tune: "He might remodel it, or build his own version upon a half forgotten recollection of the church tune he knew in his early days; or it is possible the tune itself had undergone revision and modification before he knew it, in such way as to bring it nearer his own treatment. The advance of the tune to a condition of greater rhythmical shapeliness would yield interesting matter for study." The answer to this is that the tunes as first printed by Marot and Beze remain the same to this day in all the churches, French and German, which have adopted that version. I possess a very large collection of Psalters (Marot and Beze) in French, Dutch, and German, dating from 1550 to 1873, and in every case the tunes remain as in the very earliest edition. The only change is that the melody is now sung by sopranos instead of tenors, and the key is often changed; in the case of the 150th Psalm it stands thus in the edition printed at Lausanne (1873) :-

If we change the clef of the above to the C (alto) on the third line, and substitute one flat instead of three, to put the air into F major, we get the identical notation of the oldest edition, excepting that the modern version uses notes of half the length of the old. I confess that I fail to find in the above tune any suggestion of Handel's air; I have, for years, searched foreign Psalters on the chance of discovering Handel's tune, but, up to this time, have found nothing printed earlier than 1784. I possess a book of that date with the following title: "Choralbuch enhaltend alle zu dem Gesangbuche der Evangelischen Bruder-Gemeinen von Jahre, 1778, geherige melodien"; on page 135, there is printed, in 4-2 time, Handel's tune, without composer's name, to the words, "Herz und Herz vereint zusammen."

My own belief at present is that the air was Handel's own composition, and I think my readers will agree with my judgment until evidence to the PROGRESS OR RETROGRESSION?

Is the boasted advance of musical culture and practice, of which we hear so much, a fond delusion carefully nursed by those with whom the wish is father to the thought? The question may sound strange and startling to those who have calmly accepted the generally prevailing opinion without enquiry into the evidence by which it is supported. But an article from the eloquent and humorous pen of Mr. F. Corder, which appeared in the last number of THE MUSICAL TIMES, showed at any rate the possibility of taking the facts as they exist at present, and weaving therefrom an indictment against the English public, none the less forcible because it was couched in the language of banter and ridicule. The picture drawn by Mr. Corder was calculated to offend the amour propre of many, while to distant readers, whether provincial or foreign, it would convey the most dismal impressions of the condition of music in the largest and richest city of the world. It may, therefore, be not amiss to take a grave and judicial survey of the situation with the double object of checking the evils that must assuredly accrue from a spirit of easy complacency, and of preventing out-siders from regarding our metropolis as the abode of rampant Philistinism.

That music has advanced within the last half-century cannot be doubted, and it would be waste of time to offer comparisons between the thirties and the eighties. But have we made any real progress during the present generation—say from 1860, when, I presume, Mr. Corder started on his travels in Eastern Tartary? This is a question of the utmost moment, for we have either moved forwards or backwards. There is no standing still in art matters; stagnation means retrogression. Even Mr. Pessimus Brown would be forced to admit that in one respect we have made giant strides, namely, in the matter of high-class musical education. A quarter of a century ago the Royal Academy had the field to itself, and so small was the demand for its ministrations that it was on the point of yielding up the ghost, in despair of prolonging a useful existence. At the present moment it is exhibiting exuberant vitality though contending with such formidable rivals as the Royal College, which appeals to the select few, and the Guildhall School, which offers every possible advantage to those possessing but slender purposes. At these three establishments over 3,000 students are receiving instruction, while private schools and academies without number are competing successfully with them and offering a complete curriculum of musical education, very different from the slipshod and superficial system of tuition supplied to amateurs at exorbitant terms in former days. At the bottom of the scaleif Mr. J. S. Curwen will pardon the term—there is the Tonic Sol-fa College, which in the words of the president, as reported in a daily paper recently, is "a vast organisation for making the common people of England practical musicians. Every week a million school children are learning to read music by our system and the number is rapidly increasing." So far then as the training of all classes from the highest to the lowest is concerned, we have

We now come to the question of public performances, and here it must be confessed there is room for difference of opinion, the evidence on the surface being by no means wholly satisfactory. To plunge at once into figures, it would seem from contemporary records there were in 1860 about sixty-eight high-class

tral, classical, chamber, and unaccompanied partmusic—at St. James's and St. Martin's Halls, and the Hanover Square Rooms. The number of such performances, given and announced from October last year to June this year, at St. James's and the Albert Halls, is 103. The population of London Albert Halls, is 103. The population of London during the period has increased about thirty-six per cent., while the number of first-class Concerts has risen at least fifty per cent. But this does not convey the true rate of progress. Many of the Concerts given in 1860 were very exclusive affairs, supported by wealthy dilettanti. The Philharmonic Society and Musical Union did not in any sense appeal to the public at large. At present no society governed by sane individuals would dream of giving a series of performances without making provision for a large number of shilling or half-crown seats. Again, supposing Exeter Hall to have been crowded at each of the fifteen Concerts of the Sacred Harmonic Society, the total could not have exceeded 30,000; last season the Albert Hall Choral Society's performances alone attracted 70,000 persons. No account whatever is taken in this reckoning of the innumerable Chamber Concerts now given in the smaller halls, or of pianoforte recitals, though these enter-tainments are almost wholly of recent growth. It will thus be seen that, after making full allowance for increase of population, there has been a substantial gain, not sufficient to justify vain boasting, but enough to prove that the tendency is strongly in the right direction. It may, however, be urged that London cannot be called a musical city while other forms of amusement are so much more sought after by the masses of population. There are at least thirty theatres open nightly for the greater part of the year, while of large concert halls we have only two, and one of them is only occupied some twenty or thirty times in the course of the season. At the first blush this argument seems irresistible, but a little consideration will show it to be fallacious. People who have a taste for the drama must go to the theatre to gratify it, but those who are musical need not go to Concerts. There are no theatres in the suburbs, but the number of suburban choral Societies that have sprung up within the last twenty years is truly astonishing. Some of the largest of these we hear of from time to time when they give performances on a complete scale, but the vast majority pursue their humble, but useful, career unnoticed save by their own people. And what at first sight is surprising is that these small societies and singing classes mostly abound in the poorer districts, such as Walworth, Bermondsey, Bow, &c., rather than in lordly Kensington or Bayswater. It would be interesting to know the actual number of these bodies, but the Musical Directory for 1885 mentions only three of them, namely, the Bow and Bromley Institute, the South London, and the Hackney Choral Association, under the heading "Principal London Concerts, &c.!" In an enquiry of this kind a grain of precise information is more valuable than a bushel of conjecture, however well founded, but in the absence of statistics, conclusions must be drawn from circumstantial evidence, and it would probably be well within the mark to assert that the study and progressed by leaps and bounds, and in this practice of part music in London has increased at one particular, Mr. Optimus Smith has the best of least tenfold within the last quarter of a century. If this be so, it follows that a vast number of persons of both sexes are now devoting at least one evening a week to the art, and the total is rapidly increasing. There is no corresponding movement in the theatrical world, for the amateur dramatic clubs are few in number, and the roll of members in each is necessarily limited. In the more affluent classes of society improve-Concerts—that is, performances of oratorio, orchesment is chiefly exhibited in the kind of music heard at social gatherings, and in the manner of its performance. It needs but a slight familiarity with what is called polite society to recognise the great change for the better that has taken place during the period over which our present observation extends. Formerly nothing more artistic than the leading airs from the last new opera and pianoforte solos of the Thalberg school were to be heard in fashionable drawing-rooms. Now-a-days at musical "At Homes" we meet with trio and quartet parties of instrumentalists, and while the vocalists very properly continue to bring forward new songs by the best English composers, they also include in their répertoire the choicest lyrics of the great masters. Albums of songs by Schubert, Beethoven, Schumann, Mendelssohn, and Franz are to be seen on the counters of the leading music publishers, who must be the most self-sacrificing of mortals if they issue these neat and cheap editions solely as offerings on the shrine of art. But not only is there a striking improvement in the quality of music in the home circle. Executive ability has advanced with rapid strides, and the skilled amateur, whether vocalist or instrumentalist, is becoming a source of alarm and terror to the professional performer. Formerly it was necessary to engage paid executants at all choral performances on a large scale, for amateurs could not be expected to take up the leads, or observe the marks of expression. The professional chorus singer lingers in the theatre, but elsewhere he is as extinct as the dodo, and the secondrate vocalist, pianist, and violinist is threatened with like effacement. Naturally those who are personally interested look upon the aggressiveness of the amateur as an unmixed evil, but regarding the subject from the highest stand-point, it must be acknowledged that the despairing cry of out-cast musicians is not altogether discordant, for it proves that a spirit of emulation is active among the ranks of the public, from whom alone the musical advancement of a nation can proceed. In this connection the increased study of orchestral instruments, especially the violin, and the formation of amateur orchestral Societies may be noted. For obvious reasons professional assistance is likely to be required for all time in amateur bands, for it argues a certain amount of eccentricity to make a voluntary study of some of the necessary wind and percussion instruments. But in the string department there appears to be an abundance of material at disposal, and Societies for the practice of instrumental works are well nigh as numerous as choral bodies a generation ago. Lastly it is necessary to take into account the performance of sacred music in churches at special seasons, which would have been considered profane by our fathers, but which the clergy now recognise as aids to devotion-and to the collection of funds for various purposes. It is not too much to say that the admirer of oratorio can gratify his tastes on every evening of the week during Lent and Advent by visiting different places of worship in turn. Everywhere he will find crowds of attentive listeners only too glad, apparently, to obtain a musical treat at a nominal cost. Enough has now been said to justify the assertion that it would be unjust to measure the taste of the public for music by the number of concerts, and also to prove that within the period selected for comparison there has been an advance in general taste, significant of even better results to come.

Before passing to the last and, perhaps, most important branch of the subject, it may be advisable to say a word or two with respect to opera. In 1860 there were two Italian Opera schemes in full swing, while the Pyne and Harrison enterprise supplied English Opera during the winter season. In other words, lyric drama of some sort was to be heard for nine or home.

ten months of the year. At the present moment Italian Opera is in its death throes, and its English and German rivals evince no disposition to occupy the ground in a really satisfactory manner. One will assert that here is evidence of retrogression, and another that, on the contrary, the fall of Italian Opera may be considered as proof of a desire for something better, and that the flimsy ballad operas, which were formerly considered distinctively English, are now hopelessly out of date. It would be easy to point out the road to success in national lyric drama, but we are now only concerned with facts as they are, and must therefore pass on.

It may be frankly owned that the question of "music for the people" presents almost superhuman difficulties, the chief of which is the all but total absence of data on which to found an argument. To paraphrase the words of the famous natural historian, it might be said, "Concerning music for the people; there is no music for the people." Well-intentioned efforts are doubtless being made in various directions at the present moment, to supply the poorer classes with something better than the variety show. The work done by the Kyrle People's Entertainment and People's Concert Societies, the Bow and Bromley Institute, and the Committee of the Victoria Coffee Hall, is admirable in its way, but at the best it is but a few drops of water in the ocean. Mr. Corder says that the masses truly love and enjoy the fare provided at the music hall, not because they can get no better, but because it is most suited to their intelligence. Not possessing a constitution hardened by a quarter of a century of travel I dare not follow his example and go the round of the music halls. But for the credit of my fellow countrymen I fervently hope he is wrong in his impressions. This much may be said, that the experiment of giving a superior class of entertainment with the same facilities for obtaining creature comforts as are provided at music halls, has not yet been tried. The nearest approach to anything of the kind was Evans's, but there the price of admission was too high for the working man. It would be absurd to expect the masses to attend ordinary concerts where they would be crowded together in hot galleries and have to dispense with their pipes and beer. In some of the large cities of Germany, notably Dresden, one can listen to a programme of orchestral music varying from symphonies to Gungl's waltzes performed by about forty or fifty tolerable players for a sum varying from threepence to ninepence, and at the same time sup, smoke, or drink at pleasure. It never seems to occur to any of the large restaurant or café proprietors in London that some entertainment of this kind would probably increase their profits. The expenses of an orchestra would be infinitely smaller than a variety troupe, with its "star comiques" and sensational "artistes." Perhaps some superfine persons will sneer at such a proposal, but as a matter of fact the common people of other countries have not gone beyond café and open-air concerts, and why should our own working classes be considered more capable of receiving purely intellectual food than their brethren in Germany? Anything that would wean a portion of them from the degrading atmosphere of the music-hall would be a blessing.

To sum up the whole situation, we have progressed, not retrograded, during the past twenty-five years; but the little we have accomplished shows how much more remains to be done. The thin end of the wedge has been successfully inserted; it remains for all of us who can to assist in driving it

A PLEA FOR MUSICAL AMATEURS By CHARLES L. GRAVES.

THANKS to the introduction of a Transatlantic practice of questionable value, we have recently been favoured in the columns of an enterprising "daily" with the report of an interview between their representative and Sir Arthur Sullivan. Passing over for the present such statements as "Exing over for the present such statements as "Ex-cepting Wagner... the last great German name is Schumann," and "Take purely French music from Grétry... to Gounod, and tell me what it all amounts to?" we wish to call the attention of the readers of The Musical Times to that portion of Sir Arthur's remarks which treats of the musical amateur, and, if possible, to enlist their sympathies on the side of a personage whom he has so vigorously assailed. The gist of his indictment is contained in the following passages:--" When (English) singers and instrumentalists are proficient, they are met by a serious competitor in the shape of that new development, the musical amateur." 'Is he or she very formidable?" "Extremely so, as interfering with the bread and butter of the profession. . . . Musical amateurs as a body go very little to public performances. . . . Many of them sing and play very well, and . . . make their own and their friends' music instead of paying professional performers. Such joys are cheap ... but they lop off an important item from an artist's income. I should think half the music of London is performed by amateurs to one

So far Sir Arthur, and with the accuracy of most of his statements we have little fault to find. It is only of his apparent resentment towards the attitude of the musical amateur—a perfectly legitimate attitude under the circumstances, to our way of thinking —that we wish to complain. For we state it as our unhesitating conviction that the root of the evil is just this "bread and butter" view of their profession which, as Sir Arthur has unwittingly hinted, characterises only too large a proportion of our native performers. Let us then endeavour to state the case as fairly as we can from the point of view of the musical amateur, "nothing extenuating or setting down aught in malice.'

At the present day our best native performers cannot be said to be drawn from the ranks of "Society." Our best choral singers are many of them operatives, and our best instrumentalists and vocalists-when they are not Jews or foreigners naturalised amongst us, or American, Welsh, Scotch, or Irish-are seldom of gentle birth, and therefore, though excellent musicians and persons of the most estimable character, are too often wanting in that refinement of enunciation, that grace and repose of manner which lends such a signal charm to the rendering of good music, before any audience fashionable or unfashionable. Paradoxical as it may sound, nowhere is refinement and a ladylike bearing more appreciated than by the roughest Yorkshire or Lancashire auditors. On the other hand, the musical talent of the great majority of those who possess this refinement is more than mediocre, or confined to mere appreciativeness; it is a negative or critical talent, which sees the evil without being able to give practical demonstration of the good. At the same time, there is a section of cultivated amateurs who "sing and play very well," as Sir Arthur Sullivan says-though we are inclined to believe that he slightly exaggerates their numbers

Franz, to mention no others; who hold that "French music from Grétry to Gounod amounts to "-a great deal that is noble and inspiriting and piquant; and who, free from any unpatriotic cosmopolitanism, share von Bülow's affection for "Carmen," preferring it to "Cox and Box," as they do Wagner to Wellings, or Berlioz to Behrend. Holding such convictions, heretical it may be, but sincere, is it to be wondered at that these amateurs, despairing of hearing the vocal music of their choice, new or old, from professional compatriots; and regarding the modern ballad with its taking waltz refrain (vide the columns of the Daily Telegraph) to be anathema maranatha—is it to be wondered at that they should prefer to make music to one another rather than frequent those performances where the ears of the groundlings are split and their heads set a-wagging by the "latest inspiration" in tempo di valse of Messrs. Hutchison and Jaxone? If English artists have lost the support of the intelligent public, as Sir Arthur Sullivan is inclined to believe, he may be sure that it has not been without just cause. If these musical amateurs have really become so numerous as he represents, and are so proficient as to enter into serious competition with professional artists, then the remedy is in the hands of the latter, and the sooner they set about rectifying their artistic frontier thus rudely menaced by amateur antagonists the better it will be for the musical world at large. Let them work harder and more conscientiously, and sing better music, aye, and make it, too, and they will soon regain the allegiance of the intelligent musical amateur whose absence from the concert-halls of London Sir Arthur seems to resent so deeply. Amateurs can learn an immensity from merely listening to a fine song finely delivered by a great artist, if they do not allow imitation to degenerate into mimicry; and, on the other hand, in some minor matters, our professionals might do worse than copy some of the best of the amateurs. Instead of seeing more give and take in the matter, we are met everywhere with this soreness and jealousy on the part of professionals, and this policy of mutual delectation and admiration on the part of the amateurs. What struck Berlioz—a great critic besides a great composer, pace Sir Arthur-on the occasion of his visit to Berlin in 1842, as the cause of the flourishing condition of music in the German capital, was the fact that it was "equally honoured by all, artists and amateurs." He further observes, and the passage is worth quoting, "Ladies of the highest rank do not think it derogatory to sing an oratorio of Bach beside Mantius, Boeticher, or Fräulein Hähnel." If music in London in 1885 is not altogether in a flourishing condition we are convinced that at least one of the causes is the fact that it is not equally honoured by all; how should it, when to too many, alas! it is merely a means of bringing in bread and butter? Ladies of rank, we trust, think it no more derogatory now than they did forty years back to sing alongside of first-rate professionals; but now-a-days, if amateurs are talented enough to take the principal parts in public performances, there arises a cry from the ranks of professional artists that the bread is being taken out of their mouths. So far from there being any real danger of the kind, we think there can never be too many such amateurs. If they really are worthy to appear on a footing with those who make a livelihood by music, by all means let them. Such amateurs are persons for whom, musically speaking, we should thank -who, while cherishing a sincere admiration for for whom, musically speaking, we should thank Schumann and his great forerunners, recognise the heaven. For they will demonstrate to such artists claims of other and more modern German composers as are able to take a lesson that the ideal rendering to greatness, in spite of Sir Arthur's opinion; who of a song is not attained by mere certainty of attack, are stirred by Brahms, and charmed by Jensen and or by faultlessness of intonation or production. To protest against the employment of such amateurs, was hacked and hewn in terrible wise; the wrong unpaid, for important work, if they are qualified to renderings mimicked and corrected; frequent repetiundertake it, is futile and childish. The aim of the tions of fervent words demanded to secure accuracy, conductor or entrepreneur should be to secure the best artists he can with the funds at his disposal, but he is not therefore to be debarred from availing himself of the talents of gifted amateurs if the latter are superior to any of the professional performers his finances enable him to secure. We do not think that the latter is a likely contingency, but it is occasionally a possible one, and its possibility, so far from alarming professionals into a sort of Trades Union attitude, in which they are ready to "Boycott" any conductor who employs amateur soloists, should rather stimulate them to greater exertions and teach them to regard their Art from a less mercenary point of view. For it is pretty well known that the alluring vista of financial success opened out to the possessor of a fine voice by the judicious use of a few royalty songs exercises such a deadening effect upon the profession that of our native vocalists there are but a bare handful who have the ability and inclination to study difficult good music, new or old. Our modern ballad music seems to have reached the grand climacteric of its folly, and no amount of satire will overthrow the utilitarian basis on which the nuisance rests. It pays, and that is enough, and as we ponder over this degradation of a noble art, for which, in the last resort, the public are to blame, we recall the sentiment of the great French critic already quoted, "Music is like a nighborn maiden, who must be able to live poor and unmated rather than form a mésalliance." Could a more striking example of this resolve be found than in the pathetic story of the Bohemian peasant who strove in beggary for ten long years to scale the fortress of fame and carried it in the end? Such a struggle deserves to be recorded as a veritable musical Iliad. Could we but find a parallel on English soil, the stigma that so justly attaches to us of dealing with music like shopkeepers might be fairly obliterated.

In a contemporary especially devoted to Church intelligence we recently lighted upon an article headed "At a Choir Practice," in which the writer, after telling us that on entering a church, the door of which happened to be slightly open, he saw a gesticulating figure in the chancel, and a few men and boys in the choir-stalls, continues his narration thus: "He of the many gestures, who stood in the middle of the chancel, with a book in his left hand, seemed to be Choirmaster, and the guiding spirit of the place. The boys, for the most part rosy-cheeked and sturdy, though doubtless born and bred in London air, appeared to be putting strong restraint upon their feelings, and only lapsed at intervals into furtive contemplation of tops and chestnuts drawn from their trousers pockets. But such aberrations provoked the unqualified dissent of their instructor, who seemed to think that he occupied an identical position with a clergyman in his pulpit, and might raise his voice even to a yell if he wished, so the refractory boys were often arrested in their irreverence (to the Choirmaster) by peremptory shouts, which long lingered for a short time to receive a few "finishing lessons amidst the dusty rafters of the church. The men from our leading professors. A movement of the seemed more conscious of the place in which they were assembled, and confined their conversation and through the evening Psalms, it is said, interrupted by occasional shouts from the irascible Choirmaster; but over "Rock of Ages" the tired boys became and great scorn heaped upon the offenders, until one thought that the favoured and blessed hymn would never again have its old charm for us." All persons in the habit of attending choir practices must have been quite as much struck with the want of reverence displayed by the boys of the choir as was the author of this article; but the difficulty is to devise a remedy. Unquestionably we should imagine that a Choirmaster would be selected by a competent tribunal, and paid a salary proportionate to the important and responsible duties entrusted to him. Unfortunately, however, it is too much the custom to imagine that anybody who can read notes and shout at the boys-or even, as we have been credibly informed, inflict summary chastisement upon themwill do for the office, in proof of which we cite the following advertisement, which appeared lately in a provincial paper: "Steady Young Man, to take charge of the Choir at - United Methodist Chapel, and to preside at the harmonium. Salary £3 per annum." Let us not talk of reforms in choir practices whilst such pitiful terms as these are offered to one from whom these reforms should emanate.

WHATEVER differences of opinion may be entertained respecting the advancement of England as a musical nation, and its position as compared with Germany in the cultivation of the art, it is satisfactory to find that foreign critics are disposed to admit that in the all-important matter of the cultivation of the voice we are distinctly ahead of our Teutonic neighbours. Perhaps the performances of German Opera in London by artists who hold more or less eminent positions in the lyric theatres of the Fatherland have done something towards the perfecting of enlightened opinion on the subject. It was generally remarked, even by those most favourable to the establishment of German Opera in our midst, that the performers at Covent Garden last summer could act and declaim admirably, but that, with one or two exceptions, they could not sing. these adverse strictures, proceeding alike from friends and foes, wounded the amour propre of the countrymen of the slighted artists. At any rate, the London correspondent of the Kölnische Zeitung-a journal of no mean authority-had the courage to declare recently that although German pianists and violinists of merit are certain of a warm welcome on our shores, their vocal compatriots are deemed inferior to singers of English birth and cultivation. Putting the case in the strongest possible way, he says that he "cannot sufficiently recommend German singers to study the method of Lloyd, Santley, Patey, and Hutchinson, before claiming equality with them." The artists named may be trusted to appreciate at its utmost value the compliment thus indirectly conveyed to them, and we trust that the practical effect will be to induce German vocal students either to undergo a complete course of study at our academies, or at least to visit this unmusical country from our leading professors. A movement of this kind would do something towards redressing the balance and checking any possible agitation in favour suppressed laughter to moderate limits." They got of "fair trade" in musical matters. Seriously, those who are most anxious for musical progress in this country and are dissatisfied with the present condition of affairs in respect of some of the higher restive. "Distracted minds wrought many errors, departments of the art-the cultivation of the symand each succeeding slip decreased the scanty sum phony, the sonata, and the opera--may find some of our Choirmaster's patience. So that noble hymn consolation in the thought that the English method of voice-culture has become, since the decadence of Italy, the best in the world. This may seem a bold assertion, but its accuracy cannot well be disproved.

An article in the Sunday Times of the 18th ult., under the heading "Enthusiasts Interviewed," gives an account of a conversation with Mr. S. Arthur Chappell which cannot fail to interest all musical readers. a rule we do not look with favour upon the custom of "interviewing," more especially when, as is usually the case, little but personal talk is elicited from the individual thus "drawn out" to satisfy public curiosity; but as Mr. Chappell commences his friendly gossip by saying "You must forgive me if I do not undertake to talk about myself," we know that he is going to relate something about art and artists, and are delighted to find that he gives us in a few words the history of the "Monday Popular Concerts." When St. James's Hall was built, he tells us, at a cost of £70,000 (a very large portion of which was subscribed by himself and his brother, Mr. Tom Chappell), finding that very few persons engaged it for Concerts, he talked over the matter with Sir Julius (then Mr.) Benedict, and they decided to give three Concerts during the Cattle-Show week of 1858, by which they made a net gain of £180. Encouraged by this, the brothers Chappell arranged another series of performances which they called "Monday Popular Concerts," the success of which was moderate. Luckily, however, Mr. J. W. Davison, the critic of the "Times," suggested that the experiment of providing the public with a weekly programme of classical music should be tried, and on February 14, 1859, the "Monday Pops" were fairly started, the analytical programmes of Mr. Davison being a conspicuous feature of the In spite of slender support, Mr. undertaking. Chappell and his brother stuck manfully to the plan they had inaugurated, with what result we know. The greatest artists were engaged, and the highest class music was played; the Saturday afternoon Concerts were added to those of Monday evening, and the proportions to which the répertoire of these per-formances has extended is shown by the fact of the catalogue containing upwards of 750 instrumental works. It is good that the lovers of Chamber music should not forget who first brought works of this class before the general public; and the unvarnished tale of Mr. Chappell, therefore, almost reconciles us to the practice of "interviewing."

WHEN Mrs. Kendal, in her paper upon the Stage, read some time since before a meeting of the Social Science Congress, enumerated amongst the items enjoyed by modern audiences that of "good music," we question whether she could have sufficiently maintained the truth of her assertion had she been called upon to do so. Of course, the next step, after deciding that we should not see the orchestra, adopted at some theatres, would, many persons imagined, be that we should not hear it; but this appeared to be too bold an innovation upon our old-world notions, and at some few establishments, therefore, a reform in the character of the music performed was instituted. Assuredly this is a step in the right direction, but to play high-class compositions it is necessary to have a high-class body of instrumentalists; and seeing that this cannot be secured at a house exclusively devoted to the drama, the plan of selecting works written for, or capable of being satisfactorily rendered by, a limited orchestra, should be the rule, and not, as at present, the exception. No doubt the enthusiastic amateur who delivered a lecture upon the genius of Handel, with illustrations on the flute, would assert that he was giving the public classical music; but then as it exhibition, and hardly for purposes of enjoyment?

was not that adapted for his instrument, the public could experience but little pleasure in listening to it. So when at theatres we hear great dramatic overtures with some of the wind instrument parts played upon strings, and others left out altogether, we cannot but feel either that there should be no orchestra at all or that music should be chosen fitted for a small band. That compositions of this class lie around us is an indisputable fact; and it rests therefore with leaders of theatrical orchestras to prove the truth of Mrs. Kendal's assertion: for surely works, whatever may be their artistic value, when not only feebly rendered, but presented with a mutilated version of the original score, can hardly be termed "good music."

In the Rev. C. Hylton Stewart, M.A., Precentor and Sacrist of Chester Cathedral, we have one more earnest advocate amongst the clergy of the absolute necessity of the performance of high-class music as an aid to worship in our churches and cathedrals, and more especially of the representation of Oratorios in those sacred buildings the dimensions of which will allow of all the accessories necessary to do full justice to compositions on so large a scale. In a paper read before the Church Congress in October last, at Carlisle, the author says, "As my last point in connection with Cathedrals, I would urge very decidedly the performance of Oratorios in them. The question to my mind is a very simple one: Were these grand works of Handel, Bach, and Mendelssohn meant to be used? If so, where is so appropriate a place as in a Cathedral? Reverence alone seems to demand it, rather than in a music-hall, where the sacred works are greeted with applause akin to that bestowed on a popular song, and where, probably the night before, the audience have been entertained by a travelling troupe of nigger melodists, or by a political demonstration." We may strengthen the force of this observation by saying that we recollect to have been present at a Festival performance of "The Messiah" in a Concert-hall, when, during the final chorus, the room was being prepared for a ball which was to take place a few hours afterwards. On this subject, of course, all true artists have been long agreed; and we are glad therefore to take every opportunity of adding to the testimony we have already given as to the feeling amongst the clergy themselves. "If," says the Rev. lecturer, "the ordinary and regular services of the Cathedral are carefully attended to, and not interrupted, I do not see that any one can have the whereat to grumble; and I should respectfully ask all objectors to stay at home." This is plain speaking; but it is much to the purpose, and deserves serious attention.

WE read with much pleasure a leading article in the South Australian Advertiser, not only in praise of the organ at the Town Hall of Adelaide, but in the deepest sympathy with the great works written for that instrument which, as it is truly observed, are still unknown, even to many earnest lovers of the art. "In most of the considerable cities of our time," says the writer, "which can boast of the possession of such an instrument, there are regular recitals occurring with more or less frequency, in many cases patronised and enjoyed by large numbers of the population. For there is a something about the music of the organ that appeals to the ear even of an unskilled audience. Why then," it is afterwards said, "should an instrument, presumably so rich and powerful, belonging to the entire constituency of Adelaide, stand in the hall chiefly for purposes of The use of a musical instrument is not to be looked at and admired, but to be played and listened to.' We are glad to supplement these remarks by informing our readers that this organ is no longer to be kept as a mere ornament. Mr. T. H. Jones, Organist at the Congregational Church, North Adelaide, purely with the desire of fostering a taste for classical music, has arranged to give a series of Recitals on the instrument, the first of which took place on the afternoon of October 21. The programme contained Mendelssohn's Third Sonata, an Adagio of Schubert, Chopin's Funeral March, Lemmens's "Storm Sonata," and Handel's Concerto, No. 2. All these works were excellently played; and, considering that Mr. Jones bestows his services gratuitously, we cannot but think that his efforts in the good cause deserve to be recorded and warmly acknowledged, even outside the Colony the musical education of which he has done, and is still doing, so much to advance.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL CHORAL SOCIETY.

This month we have only to record performances of "The Messiah" and "The Creation," which naturally require very little criticism. Handel's oratorio was given on the 1st ult., and, notwithstanding the frequency with which it has been heard in London this season, there was an audience very nearly filling the huge building. Madame Valleria increased her reputation as an oratorio singer by her fine rendering of the soprano solos, and a very favourable impression was created by Mr. Watkin Mills, a young baritone with a well-trained voice of rich quality. A more promising vocalist has not appeared for years, and we shall be much surprised if Mr. Mills does not take the very highest rank in his profession. Madame Patey and Mr. Lloyd completed the quartet of soloists. The choir acquitted itself as well as usual, and Mr. Barnby acceded to a demand for an encore of "For unto us a Child is born." "The Creation" no longer holds the position of the second most popular oratorio, having been compelled to yield that place to "Elijah." At the same time, Haydn's melodious work is not likely to be quickly put on the shelf. The rendering at the Albert Hall, on the 14th ult., was of fair but not of surpassing excellence. Mrs. Hut-chinson was very successful in the soprano airs, her sympathetic voice and pleasing style enabling her to render full justice to Haydn's florid music. Mr. Charles Wade is an acceptable vocalist, but his voice is not sufficiently powerful to fill so large an area. Mr. Santley was the bass. There was some falling off in the strength of the choir, the natural result being a diminished volume of tone.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

It is not often that London amateurs are treated to such an eclectic and interesting a programme as that offered by the above Society on the 23rd ult. That the tastes of its patrons had not been misjudged was evident by the large attendance, and the enthusiastic applause which prevailed, especially during the performance of Berlioz's sacred Trilogy "The Childhood of Christ." It seems strange that this remarkable work, as beautiful as it is original, should not have been taken into the repertory of many choral Societies ere this. It was first introduced into this country by Mr. Charles Hallé, at Manchester, in January, 1881, and repeated under his direction in London a few weeks later. Most likely it is also due to the initiative of this energetic conductor that we owe the performance now under notice. Theatrical and bizarre in all that he did, Berlioz has treated his subject with daring freedom, his libretto being a compound of Scriptural narrative, apocryphal legends, and the product of his own fertile imagination. It is quite possible that to some sober English minds his dramatic method of handling sacred things may be somewhat repulsive; but it must be acknowledged that there is not the slightest suggestion of irreverence in the book of the Oratorio. The music stands apart from the rest of the composer's important works by reason of the even in the hands of a Rubinstein or a Bulow such arrange-simplicity of the orchestration. We are accustomed to ments cannot be made satisfactory to musicians. In the associate Berlioz with huge masses of brass and per-cussion, but in "L'Enfance du Christ" the effects are obtained by the fewest possible instruments, even the full complement of an ordinary orchestra being only needed in one movement. And yet the work is full of the most charming and picturesque devices, affording a lesson to young composers who are apt to mistake noise for music. What could be more graphic than the Night March of the Roman guards through the streets of Jerusalem or the incantation music? The strains allotted to the terrorstricken Herod, if not beautiful, are wholly appropriate, and when we are transported to the stable at Bethlehem the music becomes exquisitely melodious and peaceful. How Berlioz deceived his prejudiced Parisian critics by asserting that the lovely little chorus, "Farewell of the Shepherds," was a seventeenth century composition discovered by him is too well known to need repeating in detail here. Perhaps the most remarkable section of the work is the final solo and chorus, "O my spirit," where the master of orchestration withdraws his beloved instruments and adopts a genuinely archaic style, the music fading away at the close to the faintest pianissimo. In brief, "The Childhood of Christ" is a singularly happy inspiration, and a better English translation than that of the late H. F. Chorley would seem to be the only thing needed to ensure its popularity in this country.

The Sacred Harmonic Society's performance was, on the whole, worthy of great praise. At first the choir was a trifle coarse, but the later numbers were given with all needful precision and delicacy. Perfection was attained by the ladies of the Royal Academy, who were entrusted with the distant choruses of angels. Mr. Hallé conducted with his accustomed ability, and the soloists, Miss Carlotta Elliot, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. Hilton, and Mr. Santley, were all admirable. The second part was occupied with Goetz's beautiful 137th Psalm, "By the waters of Babylon," and Bach's deeply solemn Cantata "God's time is the best." Neither of these masterpieces is as familiar as it should be. The former is one of the finest of modern sacred works, and the latter is peculiarly suitable for performance at the funeral obsequies of great men, or at In Memoriam Concerts. Both works were well rendered, though Bach's Cantata would have been more effective with an organ accompaniment. Miss Mackenzie sang the alto solo "Into Thy hands" with much taste.

MONDAY AND SATURDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

THE uniformly large audiences by which these entertainments have been attended during the past month, notwithstanding the absence of any sensational features, either in the way of striking novelties or phenomenal executants, afford proof of the strong hold Mr. Arthur Chappell's enterprise has gained on the public, and suggest the idea that a larger amount of good music might be offered in January, with profit to Concert givers as well as to art. The first Popular Concert after Christmas took place on Monday the 5th ult., when the programme included a new Sonata in C, for pianoforte and violoncello, by Signor Piatti. The repertory of high-class music for the instrument of which Signor Piatti is so consummate a master, is so scanty that the additions thereto he makes from time to time must be received with gratitude. The new Sonata is in four movements, but with the exception of the first they are not on an extended scale. Naturally the most important work is given to the violoncello, and an able executant could not desire a more effective medium for displaying his skill. The themes throughout are very graceful and melodious, and the treatment is more remarkable for refinement and polish than complexity or depth of thought. In other words the Sonata is a pleasing rather than a great work. It was performed to perfection by the composer and Madame Haas, and the former was recalled three times by the delighted audience. Two quartets were given, namely Beethoven's in C minor, Op. 18, No. 4, and Haydn's, in D minor, Op. 42. Madame Haas might easily have selected a more interesting piano solo than Liszt's transcription of Bach's organ prelude and fugue in A minor. She played neatly, and with quiet artistic expression, but absence of Mr. Lloyd through hoarseness, Miss Carlotta Elliot sang a fine song by Franz, "Im Herbst," and other selections by Godard and Gounod.

The main attraction on the following Saturday was Beethoven's ever popular Septet, which was given for the last time this season. Mozart's beautiful Trio in D minor, No. 2, was the only other concerted work. Herr Straus played four movements from Bach's Violin Sonata in D minor, and Miss Agnes Zimmermann contributed some of Henselt's pianoforte studies. Mr. Santley rendered Schumann's arduous ballade, "Belshazzar," in his best manner, but strangely enough the audience failed to recognise the merit of this fine composition. On Monday, the 12th, Rubinstein's Pianoforte Trio in G minor, Op. 15, was performed for the first time. This is the second of two early trios by the Russian virtuoso, and its introduction was probably due to Madame Essipoff, who was the pianist on this occasion. Like most of Rubinstein's works, its themes are striking, and in some instances beautiful, but their development is vague and uninteresting, the effect, therefore, being laboured and patchy. The pianoforte part is the most important, and Madame Essipoff rendered it as prominent as possible by her vigorous style of playing. She did not give unqualified satisfaction in her solos, the embellishments introduced in Mendelssohn's Prelude in E minor being wholly unjustifiable, while her touch in forte passages seemed hard and unsympathetic, though this may have been the fault of the foreign instrument on which she played. Schumann's Quartet in A minor, Op. 41, No. 1, and Chopin's Polonaise in C for pianoforte and violoncello were included in this programme, and Mrs. Hutchinson was the vocalist. The Concert of Saturday, the 17th, may be dealt with briefly. It opened with Haydn's Quartet in C, Op. 76, No. 3, perhaps the most popular of the entire set of eighty-three on account of the variations on the Austrian National Hymn, and it closed with Rubinstein's Sonata in D, Op. 18, for pianoforte and violoncello, one of the most acceptable of the Russian composer's works. Madame Néruda played in her finest manner three movements from Franz Ries's Violin Suite, Op. 27, which she had given five times previously with acceptance. Madame Essipoff brought forward a curious selection of pieces for a classical Concert. The first was Schumann's Aria from his Sonata in F sharp minor, Op. 11, a trifle that suffers apart from its surroundings; a flimsy caprice by Saint-Saëns on themes from Gluck's "Alceste," a portion of which was mercifully omitted; and Thalberg's showy Etude de Concert in A minor, once a favourite piece of display. Credit, however, is due to Madame Essipoff for her firm resistance to the customary demand for an encore, Miss Ambler (Mrs. Brereton) was successful in songs by Schubert and Friedemann Bach.

The appearance of a new pianist is always an event of interest, and there was a large gathering to witness the débût of Mr. Max Pauer, on Monday, the 19th. Doubtless Mr. Pauer has received a thorough musical training at the hands of his father, Mr. Ernst Pauer, who enjoys a high reputation alike as an executant, a teacher, and a writer on musical subjects. Beethoven's Sonata in A flat, Op. rro, is not a work to be interpreted by a student, and it was quickly shown that Mr. Pauer had mastered the technique of his art. His touch is pure and sympathetic, and his execution clear and accurate. He gave a somewhat uncommon reading of the Sonata, the first movement being taken slower than usual, with free indulgence in the rubato style, and the fugue proportionately quicker. We have no desire, however, to dwell on minor imperfections. The débût was a marked success, and the young pianist weakly, though naturally, accepted an encore, giving Beethoven's Rondo a Capriccio in G, Op. 129. The concerted works at this Concert were Spohr's melodious Quartet in A, Op. 93, an especial favourite with Madame Néruda, three of Schumann's Stücke im Volkston for pianoforte and violoncello (Op. 102), and Mozart's Trio in C (No. 7). Though Mdlle. Maria de Lido was only moderately successful as the vocalist, she made an interesting selection cessul as the vocalist, she made an interesting selection to fsongs by Tschaikowski, Lassen, and Goring Thomas. The duplicate title is somewhat of an anachronism There was even a denser crowd than usual on the following Saturday, two of the most popular works in the repertory being included in the programme. We allude to identify the symphony with Wales, or any other tory being included in the programme. We allude to particular nationality. It nevertheless possesses many Mozart's string Quintet in G minor, and Beethoven's characteristic beauties, and received an excellent interpre-

Sonata Appassionata. The former divinely beautiful creation was rendered to perfection, and was enthusiastically received. Madame Essipoff made her last appearance this season, and may be congratulated on having for once selected a work worthy of her powers, in place of the trifles with which she had previously contented herself. She gave a powerful and spirited interpretation of Beethoven's colossal Sonata, and was three times recalled. Another enjoyable item was Schubert's Trio in B flat. Op. og: though why this work should be given so often, in preference to the much finer Trio in E flat, it is difficult to say. Mr. Maas was announced to sing, but an apology was made for him, and Mr. Thorndike, who took his place, won favour in Purcell's "Twice ten hundred Deities," Dvorák's "Als die alte Mutter," and Schumann's "Frühlingsnacht."

The Concert of Monday last contained no feature of special interest, unless the performance of Dvorák's Trio in F minor, for the second time, can be so called. This remarkably fine and original work improves greatly on acquaintance, and must be numbered among the gifted Bohemian composer's best efforts. It was perfectly rendered by Mr. Charles Hallé, Madame Néruda, and Signor Piatti, and very cordially received. Mr. Hallé was in splendid form, and gave an interpretation of Beethoven's Sonata in E flat (Op. 31, No. 3), which it would be difficult to surpass. The programme included Mozart's beautiful Quartet in D (No. 7) and three of Heller and Ernst's Pensées Fugitives, for pianoforte and violin. An apology was made for Miss C. Elliot, but she sang with good taste songs by Franz, Dvorák, and Sterndale Bennett.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL. (FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE close of the old year and the ushering in of the new have brought with them the usual flush of musical events, evidencing no decadence in the spirit of local enterprise, and little if any depreciation in the public patronage accorded.

Foremost in chronological order, the series of "Messiah" performances with which the past year concluded stand out as thoroughly in keeping with precedent. The first of these was given on Christmas Day, in St. James's Hall, by the Liverpool Cambrian Choral Society, the soloists, of whom there were a goodly number, being chosen from amongst the ranks of local amateurs and professionals. On December 27, the Young Men's Christian Association Choral Union made the sublime oratorio the subject of their second appearance this season in the Philharmonic Hall, the soloists being Miss Mary Davies, Madame Antoinette Sterling, Mr. B. Davies, and Mr. Bridson.

The third and last rendering of the "Messiah" was given in St. George's Hall, on New Year's Eve, by the Liverpool Philharmonic Choral Society. The band and chorus numbered 350 performers, and the solo quartet comprised Miss Clara Samuell, Miss Janet F. Russell, Mr. Shakespeare, and Mr. Herbert E. Thorndike. The facilities possessed by this Society ensured a perfect rendering, the massive choruses being given out with all the requisite breadth and grandeur. Mr. Randegger conducted, Mr. H. Grimshaw presiding, in place of Mr. Best, at the great organ.

The Philharmonic Society gave its sixth performance of the season at the Philharmonic Hall on Tuesday, December 23, with a rendering of Handel's "Jephtha." Mr. Lloyd, Miss Mary Davies, Miss Eleanor Rees, and Mr. Frederic King were the soloists. Miss Rees possesses a contralto voice of beautiful quality, especially in the upper register, and is a decided acquisition to the ranks of oratorio singers. The choruses were given with commendable steadiness throughout, and all went well under Mr. Hallé's bâton.

The second half of the Society's programme was commenced on the 6th ult., with a miscellaneous selection, the chief feature of interest being the introduction to Liverpool of Mr. Cowen's Fourth (Welsh) Symphony.

welcome, sang in her usual artistic manner "Dove Sono, and four songs "In from "Le Nozze di Figaro," and four sone Memoriam," composed by Miss Maude Valèrie who herself accompanied them on the pianoforte.

The fifth Concert of Mr. Halle's present series was held in the Philharmonic Hall, on Tuesday, the 13th ult., deservedly attracting a large audience. Antonin Dvorák's Symphony in D major was the first item on the programme, and the attention and favour accorded to it showed how highly the audience appreciated this representative work of a composer who has so rapidly risen from obscurity to prominence and fame. Signor Piatti, by his finished style and execution, lent an interest to a Concerto by Rubinstein, possessing no particular merit; he also played a largo and gigue, by Veracini, and in response to an encore, gave with great expression and delicacy, No. 44 of Mendelssohn's Lied ohne Worte. Miss Mary Davies was the vocalist.

The recently formed Liverpool Society of Professional Musicians held its inaugural dinner on the 8th ult., in the presence of the president, Sir George Macfarren, who made a happy speech as to the laudable objects which such a society should have in view.

The return of the Carl Rosa Opera Company to Liverpool has been specially memorable by the introduction to this city of several comparatively new operas, including Boïto's "Mefistofele," Millöcker's "Beggar Student," and the first representation in England of Massenet's "Manon." Mr. Rosa having only recently assumed the proprietorship of the Royal Court Theatre, with all the advantages which such a personal proprietorship implies, has been enabled by the facilities at his command to place these and his other long list of operas before the public in an exceptionally complete manner, both as regards staging and general accessories, and it is therefore gratifying to state that the successes achieved have been thoroughly earned. event of the season-the first production of "Manon"took place on the 17th ult., exactly twelve months after the original performance at the Opera Comique in Paris, and must be recorded as an unequivocal triumph. Patronised by the presence of the Mayor in state, and a number of the nobility, with an audience filling every part of the house to repletion, the occasion will stand out as memorable in the annals of operatic successes. "Manon" has received the stamp of approval by a provincial audience noted for critical discrimination; whether it has sufficient body and stamina to live amongst the roll of popular operas, time only can show. The plot of popular operas, time only can show. The plot of "Manon" (adapted from the story of the Abbé Prevost) is from the pen of MM. Meilhac and Gille, the extremely onerous task of writing the English version having been undertaken with marked ability by Mr. Joseph Bennett. The intention of the French text has been rigidly adhered to, and if there is at times any deflection from the graceful rhythm of the original libretto, the fault lies rather with the English language than with the translator. It would be impossible to compress within limited compass a complete description of the romantic story upon which the opera is based. In fact, its very comprehensiveness interferes somewhat with the continuity of the drama, which is rather represented by a series of phases and incidents, all full of life and realistic truthfulness. The difficult transition from the fourth to the fifth act is necessarily somewhat crude, the concluding scene verging almost upon an anti-climax, but the beauty of the mounting and the pathos of the situation save it from such a fate. The story, belonging to the early part of the 18th century, is that of a simple but wayward village girl, whose attractions soon secure her a wealth of admirers, and suddenly plunge her into the midst of Parisian gaiety and frivolities. The frailty of her character cannot stand the test, and, at first the queen and idol of fashion, she sinks to the level of the gambling-house and the demi-monde, and dies a felon, wrecked and ruined by the hollow pleasures which were once the goal of her ambition. This is the pathetic history of Manon, and round her circle a series of characters all truthfully pourtrayed. Her lover, the ever faithful and constant Chevalier des Grieux; her cousin Lescaut, a gay and reckless soldier; the old roue Guillot Morfontaine, who eventually wreaks tation by Mr. Halle's band. M. Jules de Swert was the a spiteful revenge by procuring Manon's arrest; the fascisolo violoncellist, and Mrs. Hutchinson, who is always nating trio of actresses whose charms first awakened Manon's nating trio of actresses whose charms first awakened Manon's yearning to see something of "life"-are all vivid, speaking pictures, and realise the intention of the original plot.

Such a story, essentially French in every detail, requires a musical setting of great elasticity and diversity, this Massenet has been singularly successful. If en If entire originality cannot be claimed in the structure of "Manon, neither, on the other hand, can the composer be charged with the crime of plagiarism. The orchestration throughout is eminently fitted to the work; at times light and fantastic, it develops with the thread of the story into passages of high dramatic intensity-particularly is this the case in the third act, the scene in the chapel between Manon and Des Grieux, and at the conclusion of the fourth scene, where Manon's gay career is brought to a tragic ending. Massenet is always happy in the concerted music which abounds throughout the opera, and evidences in the structure of the work his musicianly training. The employment of the Leitmotiv, now becoming almost a fundamental principle, is clearly apparent and never fails in its effect, and the introduction of a subdued chorus issuing from the chapel in the third act not only lends an impressive reality to the scene, but in its broad skilful writing evinces the composer's just appreciation of the laws of counterpoint. In the general plan of the opera Massenet has followed closely in the lines which have now become-whether advisedly so or notthe fashion in the writing of modern operas: -we allude to the almost entire exclusion of "airs." The exceptions are but two, a delightful flowing dreamsong, in which Des Grieux entices Manon with the prospect of their future happy country life, and the laughing worldly song, "List to the voice of youth when it calleth," which has been specially interpolated in the third scene, and in which Manon revels in the abandon of her sensual existence. These were appreciated by the audience, being encored in both

The tenor solo referred to has a delicious soothing accompaniment of muted violins. The device is a happy one, and is evidently a favourite, from its frequent adoption at other points in the opera, notably the dying scene, the pathetic realism of which is heightened by the free use of the harp, the melody being relegated to the oboes.

With all the poetic and musical beauties which "Manon"

undoubtedly possesses, we cannot avoid the expression of opinion that the absorbing interest in the story, developed by the second and third acts, is scarcely sustained to its conclusion. Practice and repetition will probably bring the length of the work within more reasonable limits, but if an opera is to become popular it is manifest that the interest of the auditory should not be allowed to diminish, and if the hastening of the climax could be judiciously arranged, we believe it would conduce to the permanence of the opera.

We have now only to refer to the performance, and of this nothing but praise can be recorded. Manon, in her many sided character, was impersonated by Madame Marie Roze, and her creation of the part in England will rank high with her many other rôles, the naïveté of the village girl and the gaiety of the Parisian queen being fully realised. Mr. Barton McGuckin as the luckless hero, Des Grieux sang his music in splendid style, and his truthful reading of the character in all its tenderness and delicacy was a perfect study. By his assumption of the part Mr. McGuckin has made a distinct advance in the histrionic art. Mr. Ludwig, as Lescant, a comparatively minor character, showed the true artist, and the other parts were all filled by a strong and efficient cast. Mr. Goossens conducted the performance without a hitch, and the demonstrative approbation of the audience must have been gratifying to all concerned. The scene of enthusiasm at the close of the third act was beyond all precedent.

Boïto's "Mefistofele," new to Liverpool, has also met with considerable success. This opera although from the same fount as Gounod's "Faust" is unlike it in many respects. Boïto, as author and composer, deals with Goethe's poem in all its completeness, and concludes with the death of "Faust." The music also is mainly of the weird, supernatural character, the melodies being few but none the less sweet and telling. The duet at the commencement of the second act between Helen of Troy and Pantalus deserves special notice for its delightful rhythm and grace, and the beautiful classical character of the surroundings render this scene one of the brightest phases of the opera. Madame Marie Roze, Miss Burton, Mr. McGuckin, and Mr. Ludwig each gave a satisfactory rendering of their respective roles, Mr. Ludwig's impersonation of the evil spirit being thoroughly artistic. The work depends very largely upon the setting, and with the facilities at Mr. Rosa's disposal, he has secured a mise-en-scene far superior to ordinary provincial performances.

Millöcker's "Beggar Student," of Continental fame, is also new to Liverpool, and has been accorded a large share of patronage. It would be hypercritical to cavil at the taste or judgment of an impresario in including a work in his season's programme which, although light and trivial in its pretensions, has proved its own popularity, and has at least served the purpose—not an unimportant one—of throwing into grander relief the more serious operas comprised in Mr. Rosa's repertory.

Amongst the other successes of the season have been Goring Thomas's "Esmeralda" and Bizet's ever popular

"Carmen."

The forthcoming Handelian Bicentenary, which takes place during the present month, is to be celebrated in Liverpool by a performance of "Judas Maccabæus," in St. George's Hall, by the Philharmonic Choral Society, on the 19th inst., under the official patronage and presence of the Mayor and Mayoress.

All musicians, whether amateurs or professionals, will feel a common interest and concern in the fact that Mr.

W. T. Best, the greatest of English organists, has for several weeks been suffering from a dangerous illness, which at one time gave cause for the gravest apprehensions. It is now, however, hoped that Mr. Best has passed through the worst phases of the malady, and with care and rest we trust that his entire recovery will be speedy and certain. His place at the St. George's Hall organ is, in the interval, being taken by Mr. F. H. Burstall, of the Cathedral, Mr. H. Grimshaw, and other local organists.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM. (FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

SINCE the customary Christmas Concerts, which the exigencies of publication rendered it impossible to deal with last month, Birmingham has not devoted over much thought or time to musical art, outside the somewhat frothy variety associated with the rule of Dame Terpsichore. Of dance music, indeed, there has been enough and to spare, both in public and private; and as the Town Hall and other principal music rooms are engaged nearly every night for balls, and the three local theatres are still in the grip of the Pantomime Demon, with no chance of release for another month or two, it is not easy to see how relief is to be obtained by the lovers of a more rational species of entertainment.

"The Messiah" performance on Boxing-night, by the members of the Festival Choral Society, was, as usual, a great popular success, in spite of one or two holiday contretemps, of which the most conspicuous was the indisposition of Mr. Maas, which compelled him to quit the orchestra without completing his allotted task. There were evidences of infirmity and inequality in his singing of the Passion music, but he was nevertheless warmly applauded by an indulgent holiday audience. Towards the close of the second part, however, when it came to his turn to sing "Thou shalt break them," he was not to be found, and when the Conductor, Mr. Stockley, who went in search of him, returned with the disappointing intelligence that Mr. Maas had left the hall in consequence of an attack of neuralgia, a few hisses mingled with the sympathetic applause of the majority. In other respects the performance was a fairly effective one. Miss Samuell impressed the audience very favourably in the principal soprano music, Madame Bolingbroke proved quite equal to the requirements of the contralto part, and Mr. Brereton was effective in the bass solos, "The people that walked" and "Why do the nations?" The chorus singing was not wanting in vigour, spirit, or assurance, but some of the lighter numbers might have been rendered with more delicacy. The band was quite up to the average of a Christmas performance.

On the following evening, the Philharmonic Union, which had for some time previously been in eclipse, owing to the unsuccessful financial results of its catering, gave a performance, in the Town Hall, of the first two parts of Haydn's "Creation," followed by a short miscellaneous selection, with Madame Georgina Burns, Mr. C. W. Fredericks, and Mr. H. Harrison as vocal principals. There was a fairly numerous and efficient chorus, and a band quite equal to the exigencies of the score, with Mr. Stimpson as organist and Dr. Swinnerton Heap conducting. Madame Burns, who was previously known here only as an operatic singer, took the audience fairly by suronly as an operate single, took the addeduction prise, by the breadth of tone and phrasing and the dignity of style which she revealed in "The marvellous work," "With verdure clad," and "On mighty pens," and the singing of her two male associates was very praiseworthy. Of the choral performances, generally, it may be said that they were smooth and correct, rather than impressive, owing to deficiency of numbers. The instrumental portion, however, received ample justice at the hands portion, nowever, received ample justice at the names of the orchestra. In the second part of the Concert Madame Burns greatly delighted her hearers by her brilliant execution of the Polacca from "Mignon," after which she was honoured with a double and enthusi-astic recall. In the March and Chorus from Wagner's "Tannhäuser," the choir was a little overweighted. Weber's Overture to "Der Freischütz," spiritedly played by the band, brought the Concert to an effective conclusion. A homely little Concert was given in the Town Hall, on the 6th ult., in aid of the Jaffray Suburban Hospital, and owing not so much perhaps to its intrinsic attractions as to the popularity of the cause, it brought together a large and appreciative audience. The programme was of the miscellaneous order, but comprised a fair proportion of new and unhackneyed pieces, both vocal and instrumental. In the latter department Mr. Abbott won much applause by his playing of Ernst's always welcome "Elégie," and a Concerto, by Ferdinand David, as well as in a couple of movements from Mendelssohn's D minor Trio, and the Duo for violin and piano, by Benedict and De Beriot, on airs from "La Sonnambula." Dr. Winn's playing of the pianoforte par in the concerted pieces, and of a telling Valse by Mosskowski, and a Gavotte by Bach, was also very creditable; and Mr. A. J. Priestley produced a favourable impression in his violoncello solos, Dunkler's Rêverie and Tarantelle. Miss Esmè Lee, Miss Fanny Edwards, Miss Blanche Murray, Mr. Courtice Pounds, Mr. Musgrove Tufnail, Mr. Hervè d'Egville, and Mr. F. Yardley contributed the vocal portion of the entertainment, which was very warmly received.

Messrs. Harrison's third Concert, on the 19th ult., was scarcely up to the high standard of its predecessors, either in musical interest or artistic éclat, but it appeared to afford entire satisfaction to the large audience which it brought together. The vocal honours were carried off by Madame Alwina Valleria, Madame Antoinette Sterling, and Signor Foli, whilst instrumental art was worthily represented by Madame Essipoff, pianist; Miss Lilian Dixon, violinist; M. Hollman, violoncellist; and Signor Bisaccia, pianist and conductor. Madame Valleria, who was in admirable voice, delighted the audience especially by her singing of the tuneful Bolero from Verdi's "Vepres Siciliennes." Miss Eleanor Rees gave evidence of the possession of a mezzo-soprano voice of excellent quality in "O mio Fernando." Madame Antoinette Sterling's most effective numbers were a couple of Beethoven's Schöttische Lieder, Op. 108, Nos. 6 and 7, and Signor Foli's grand voice found effective scope in a song of Blumenthal's, "Across the far blue hills, Marie," as well as in Hatton's humorous "Wedding of Shon Maclean." Mr. Redfern Hollins and Mr. Clifford Hallé (son of the eminent pianist) impressed the audience favourably by their performances. Madame Essipoff, who had not been heard in Birmingham for some eight years prior to this occasion, showed that her playing had lost nothing in delicacy, charm, or finish. The violoncello playing of M. Hollman and Signor Bisaccia's pianoforte selections were highly appreciated. Miss Dixon's violin playing was distinguished rather by refinement than by power, and would have been more effective in a smaller room.

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE lull in the musical atmosphere which followed the Christmas festival has passed away, and we are once more in the full swing of an unusually busy season. Among the most important of the Concerts which have taken place in this district during the past month has been the fourth Bradford Subscription Concert, which took place in St. George's Hall, on the 16th ult. The audience were favoured with the appearance of Madame Valleria, whose important connection with the last Leeds Musical Festival has placed her high in the estimation of Yorkshire musicians, and with that of another artist whose visit to Bradford was one of exceptional interest-M. Jules de Swert, the Belgian violoncellist. M. de Swert appeared in the double capacity of composer and instrumentalist. His well-known second Concerto for cello and orchestra proved one of the best features of the programme, and being admirably played, its gracefulness and freedom of style were appreciated no less than the delicacy and sweetness of tone which the soloist produced from his instrument. Of the orchestral items, Beethoven's C minor Symphony stood out in bold relief, and its wonderful contrasts and subtle developments were followed with intelligent interest by the audience. This was by no means the first performance of the work in Bradford, but it was none the less enjoyable on that account, for Mr. Halle's well-known enthusiasm for Beethoven is shared to the fullest extent by his Bradford friends. The programme included three Overtures, familiar to most people, yet invariably interesting, and more particularly so in this instance from the marked contrasts of style which were afforded by their production at the same Concert, namely, the Overtures to the "Midsummer Night's Dream," "Tannhauser," and "Semiramide." Bizet's orchestral suite "L'Arlèsienne" also constituted a charming feature.

The progress made by some of our younger societies deserves to be noted as among the most remarkable things appertaining to musical life in the vigorous population of the West Riding. The Concert of the New Leeds Musical Society, which took place on the 12th ult., may be referred to as a favourable example in this respect. The Society, which has attained its second year of existence, gave a highly successful performance of Romberg's "Lay of the Bell," with the assistance of Madame Carina Clelland (soprano), Mr. W. H. Harrison (tenor), and Mr. D. Billington (bass). The chorus was well balanced and efficient, and did full justice to the work. The second part of the programme consisted of miscellaneous selections. Mr. J. W. Longley was again the Conductor, and Mr.

Thalberg Binns the pianist.

An interesting Concert of a type which is being in a special sense revived, was given by the Huddersfield Glee and Madrigal Society, on the 14th ult. This was the second Concert of the season given by the Society, and the attendance proved that the taste for the quaint productions of the fathers of English music is still keen. Examples of part music, madrigals, and other similar com-positions occupied almost the whole of the evening. The singing was both refined and effective. Among other items rendered by the Society and the Arion Quartet party were Bishop's Sestet "Stay, prithee, stay," Benet's Madrigal "Come, shepherds, follow me," Caldicott's "Jack and Jill," Di Lasso's "Ye Nightingales," Battye's "Child of the sun," and Stevens's "Ye spotted snakes." The Concert was very enjoyable. Mr. W. H. Cross was the Conductor. The solo vocalists were Mrs. Rhodes, Mrs. Paterson, and Mr. R. Weavill. Signor Raspi gave several bassoon solos, and Mr. J. E Sykes presided at the pianoforte.

A Concert of unusual artistic merit was given at Halifax, on the 5th ult., by Messrs. Pohlmann & Son. The occasion served to introduce M. Henri Logé, a pianist who, though young, has already made his mark, and who has done good things as a composer. A pupil of Rubinstein, his playing is creditable to his master, for, like him, the most difficult music has apparently no terrors for him, and his taste is beyond question. At the same Concert Miss Laura C. Bissill, contralto, a Royal Academy medalist, gave proof of vocal accomplishments of the highest order.

connection with the Royal Academy, also earned golden opinions from the audience, and the other artists-Brousil (violinist) and Signor Giulio (baritone)-contributed admirably to a Concert full of unqualified enjoyment.

An Organ Recital of considerable interest was given in the Leeds Parish Church, on the 12th ult., by Dr. Creser. Selections from Bach, Augustus Moricani (the Organist of the Patriarchal Basilica of St. Peter), Handel, S. S. Wesley, E. T. Chipp (Organist of Ely), and Guilmant comprised the programme. Dr. Spark continues his Recitals on the fine instrument in the Leeds Town Hall with the appreciation of large audiences. The music is usually selected with a view to its instructiveness, and Dr. Spark's programmes are therefore both agreeable to the public and helpful to students of music. It is not often now-a-days that one hears of the performance of Haydn's "Seasons," for notwithstanding its melodious beauty, it is voted by many people old-fashioned and wanting in elements of popularity. Its revival by the Leeds Philharmonic Society, on the 7th ult., was, however, not only an interesting event, but afforded much satisfaction to the large audience which assembled. Coupled with it, or rather with the two parts of it, "Spring" and "Summer," which were selected for performance, was the "Walpurgis Night," a work which was appreciated none the less because it was familiar. The great feature of the performance was the solo singing. Mrs. Ash, a vocalist of great culture, refinement, and natural ability, did wonderful things with the soprano music of the "Seasons," and fairly captivated the audience by her rendering of the familiar scena from "Der Freischütz," known as "Softly sighs." The tenor solos of both works were given with much refinement by Mr. Seymour Jackson, and Mr. Watkin Mills produced a good impression in the music allotted to the bass. Mrs. Alfred Broughton was successful in the part of the Aged Woman of the "Walpurgis Night." The band and chorus were efficient as usual, and the performance was ably conducted by Mr. Alfred Broughton. The Society's next Concert will include Dvorák's "Stabat Mater.

Sir Julius Benedict visited Halifax on the 13th ult. with Madame Cave-Ashton's Opera Company, which occupied the boards of the Theatre Royal for a week. Sir Julius, who conducted the band throughout the per-formance of "Il Trovatore" and in selections from some of his own works, met with a most hearty reception.

The Bradford Festival Choral Society has, in conjunction with the committee of the Bradford Joint Hospital Fund, taken steps to celebrate the bi-centenary of Handel's birth by giving a Musical Festival in St. George's Hall on the 24th inst. It is intended to give a morning performance of "Judas Maccabæus" and a miscellaneous selection in the evening. A guarantee fund of £500 has already been subscribed. The proceeds are to be devoted to the three local hospitals. The productions of Schubert were prominently brought before the public of Bradford by a Lecture-Concert, which took place on the 20th ult. Mr. Ward, Conductor of the Bradford Old Choral Society, who was the lecturer, after alluding to the neglected genius of Schubert, reviewed his compositions and made special reference to his inventive capacity. Among the selections introduced by way of illustration, and performed by Mrs. Stevenson Arnold (soprano), Mrs. Ashcroft Clarke (contralto), Mr. Rees (violin), Mr. Ward (pianoforte), and a chorus of twenty ladies associated with the Society, were the choruses "God in Nature," "The Lord is my Shepherd," "Coronach," and a serenade with alto chorus, all of which were novelties and beautiful specimens of the composer's skill.

The Glasgow Select Choir created something in the nature of a sensation on the occasion of a recent visit to Leeds, and the Concert which was given in the Victoria Hall, on the 22nd ult., was remarkable not only for an enormous gathering of the "clans" who have settled in Yorkshire, but for the large assemblage of Yorkshire people themselves. The welcome received by the choir was of an enthusiastic kind, and was fully deserved on artistic grounds. Our Yorkshire choruses have more than once called forth the praise of musical authorities for the sweetness and purity of their tone, but Mr. Allan's choir, as few Miss Jenny Eddison, who has taken similar honours in could deny, showed the possession of many qualities hitherto unacquired by many of our local societies. Doubtless much of the fulness, roundness, purity of tone, and marvellous precision which characterise their singing is the result of constant practice together. The programme consisted of Scotch songs and choruses, with the addition of a few English songs and glees and two organ solos by Dr. Spark. Needless to say, the Concert was greatly enjoyed.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER. (From our own Correspondent.)

PROBABLY in no part of England is the festival of Christmas celebrated with more musical fervour than in this district. By a very large, and apparently increasing, number of people to attend an annual performance of Handel's "Messiah" is regarded as an almost sacred obligation. Year after year, at the seasonable repetitions of this nationalised work, may be seen the beaming and excited faces of many who certainly could not be classed as regular frequenters of our concert-rooms, but who crowd to listen again and again to strains that touch their sympathies in a way that no other music could, and excite emotions that no other influence could stir. It may be that, primarily, many are moved by feelings responding to the season (not entirely devoid of the glow of a patriotic tinge) that warms them to, and culminates in, an exalted, enthusiastic, devotional spirit of a more absorbed kind than, ordinarily, their minds are attuned to. It is evident that, although powerfully attracted by the promise of any unusual excellence of performance, their interest lies in the oratorio itself, almost irrespective of any peculiar merit of interpretation; and that the pleasure derived consists, to a very large extent, in a rekindling of memories, a return to valued associations that in the battle of every-day life have little chance of indulgence. To thousands the great Saxon musician, being dead, yet speaks with a force, eloquence, and pathos that graces no other tongue. How else could we account for the breathless attention, the pent-up emotion of an audience-nay, of a congregationthat would, ordinarily, be considered essentially unmusical; and for the fact that the overflow of one hall will, rather than be altogether disappointed, turn into the nearest place wherein the same work is being, ever so much more humbly, performed? At our Free Trade Hall, at the Association Hall, in many of our suburban Town Halls, and in almost every one of the surrounding towns, wrapt enthusiasts have (this Christmas, perhaps, more than ever before) testified to the immortality of the music that, to multitudes of English people, has become consecrated as a symbol and a channel of their highest emotions. And it may be that the very love of our people for the Oratorio itself causes them to tolerate, and even in the power of the music to overlook, demerits of performance that, in the interpretation of less esteemed works, would be strongly resented. It is certain that no other great work is so carelessly rendered, or presented in so hap-hazard or expressionless a manner. Still, we certainly have advanced beyond the intelligence of the time when one of our local critics besought the conductor not to repeat such an innovation as a choral rendering of the strains "Since by man came death" and " For as in Adam all die"; but to return to the quartet mode of performance designed by the composer (!), and hallowed in our memory by so many and such disgraceful messes. By the way, I noticed the other day in the same journal that Dvorák's great "Stabat was written for the last Worcester Festival, instead of having been completed somewhere about ten years. Perhaps the composer may like to correct his record of work. And this reminds me that Mr. Hallé has lately offered to his subscribers an admirable performance of the Symphony in D major of the now popular Bohemian, and a really splendid interpretation of Beet-hoven's "Eroica." In both works, as well as in the recent specimens of Wagner and in many overtures, the improvement, as well as the augmented string-power, of the orchestra has been demonstrated. At his last Concert in December Mr. Hallé—in consequence of the non-arrival of the band parts of Rubinstein's Concerto— repeated Saint-Saëns's rather loosely constructed G minor Pauer made his first appearance here, under Mr. Halle's auspices, on the 8th ult., playing with vigour, and rather massively, Gernsheim's Concerto in C minor. At the following Concert Mrs. Hutchinson introduced the air, "The Lord is my Shepherd," from Mackenzie's "Rose of Sharon." Although perhaps not quite so effective as in its place in the work, the song made considerable impression. the graceful orchestration (much too loudly played) being greatly admired. The Symphony was Schumann's heavy "Rhenish," certainly a solid, if not a fanciful, work. Belgian cellist, M. Jules de Swert, made a most favourable impression; his executive capabilities being of the highest character. In addition to all these performances we have had a repetition of Rossini's "Moses in Egypt," and a ninth performance of Berlioz's "Faust," a work which, in Manchester, never fails to attract and interest an immense audience.

Mr. de Jong continues his Concerts on Saturday evenings, alternately with the cheaper Working Men's Entertainments which afford desirable opportunities of publicity to local singers. At both series the music has been of a popular—not to say a "royalty"—style, not needing record. Mr. Cross, also, at the neighbouring Association Hall, has similarly, and successfully, catered for his friends. Mr. Pyne's Organ Recitals, at the Town Hall, retaining their popularity, happily attest the desire of at least a select few for more serious music. The same gentleman has, in the same place, been lecturing on the history of the piano and the organ. At the former lecture an attractive feature was the introduction of several of the older instruments of the piano tribe, including a clavichord by Silbermann, a virginal, and a valuable spinet. To many present the opportunity of hearing tones like those which charmed our foremothers was very interesting.

At the Concert Hall the entertainments during the last month have been rather promiscuous. Perhaps the most interesting matter to a Manchester audience was the first appearance of Mr. Clifford Hallé. Both for his father's sake and because of his own evident promise, the young baritone was warmly welcomed. With a pleasing, though not very powerful, voice, a gentlemanly demeanour, and a sympathetic style, Mr. Clifford Hallé ought to enjoy a prosperous and useful career. At the same Concert, Miss Emily Shinner played excellently Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, reflecting great credit upon her tutor (Herr Joachim), and evineing great skill and intelligence.

The first Concert in the new year was an amateur performance, mainly under the direction of Mr. C. J. periorinance, mainly and the discount of the presence of Mr. C. Harford Lloyd to conduct his short Cantata "Hero and Leander," which had previously gained here a favourable reception, having had the advantage of one or two highly finished vocal renderings. The choruses were fairly given; but, unfortunately, the orchestration was beyond the reach of the band, and considerable difference of opinion concerning pitch detracted from the pleasure of the audience. Whether the somewhat mixed scheme adopted by the directors of the Gentlemen's Concerts will tend to promote the longevity of the institution or not, there can be no doubt that Mr. Halle's afternoon Pianoforte Recitals have exactly met a general desire, and have, with very great advantage, superseded the feeble lectures upon music which were formerly the only amusement provided in daylight for musical amateurs. Several Organ Recitals have, during the month, been given by Mr. James Lowe, a skilful local player. At Newton-le-Willows he had the advantage of the assistance of Miss Wallington, a young soprano who is just now exciting a great deal of interest in this neighbourhood, and who, at Wigan (12th ult.,), at a Chamber Concert given by Messrs. Alexander and Dawber, certainly warranted that friendly interest. Miss Amina Goodwin, at a Concert given during the Christmas holidays, displayed very considerable skill in pianoforte playing. Doubtless time will bring her more certainty, expression, and grasp of the musical intention of the authors whose works she essays.

the orchestra has been demonstrated. At his last Concert in December Mr. Hallé—in consequence of the non-arrival of the band parts of Rubinstein's Concerto—I am glad that the perseverance of the Choir has been thus rewarded, for the singing was marked by great taste Concerto, which he had played once before. Herr Max may count upon a warm welcome.

I am very glad to be able to end my monthly report by noticing a really creditable (but only partly amateur) performance at the Concert Hall, on the 26th ult., of Gade's "Crusaders" and Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion." Under Mr. Hecht's spirited guidance, the St. Cecilia Amateur Choral Society has attained an honourable local position; and, as the regular band of the "Gentlemen's Concerts" was engaged for the occasion, there was, at least, unanimity of pitch. Not unnaturally, the power of the orchestra occasionally overshadowed the efforts of the vocalists. But a critic would indeed be difficult to please who could not be gratified by a performance in which evidence of earnestness and skill, and of intelligent realisation of the composer's intention, were distinctly

MUSIC IN THE WEST.

THE Bristol Madrigal Society gave its forty-ninth annual "Ladies' Night" Concert at the Victoria Rooms, on the 15th ult., and, in spite of the bitter wind, long before the opening of the doors a great crowd had gathered before them, eager to be admitted, and quite three-quarters of an hour before the time of commencing the programme the large saloon was nearly filled. The choir numbered 119 voices, divided thus: trebles, 44; altos, 19; tenors, 28; basses, 28. Four boys came from Windsor, four from Gloucester, eight from Bristol Cathedral, six from St. Mary Redcliffe, and twenty-two belonged to the Society. Amongst the altos were Mr. Packer, from the Chapel Royal, Windsor, and Messrs. Bilton and Booth, from Cambridge. Amongst the tenors were Messrs. Hunt and Clinch, from Windsor. As the President, Secretary and Conductor took their respective places on the orchestra they were warmly greeted. There were two novelties in the programme, the one in the first part being an eight part composition by Mr. Williams, Organist of Gloucester Cathedral, "When twilight dews are falling fast," and in the second part a madrigal by Mr. Lloyd, of Christ Church, Oxford, "When in Corinna's eyes I gaze." Both composers were present, and were loudly called for at the close of their pieces, which were warmly encored. The rendering of each work was exceedingly good. The rest of the programme was as follows: "Sing we, and chant it," Morley; "Lady see! on every side," Marenzio; "Stay, Corydon," Wilbye; "Fly hence with me," Mendelssohn; "Ladye, when I behold," Wilbye; "O sing unto mie roundelaye," Wesley; "Light of my soul," Pearsall; "Down in a flow'ry vale," Festa; "To shorten winter's sadness," Weelkes; "In dulci jubilo," Pearsall; "Die not, fond man," Ward; "In going to my lonely bed," Edwards; "All is still," Macfarren; "Fair Oriana," Hilton; "This pleasant month of Maie," Beale; "The Fisherman's Good Night," Bishop, and "The Waits," Saville. Most of the pieces were well known favourites at these Concerts, and the work of the choir was most admirable throughout, the phrasing being especially good, and the tone excellent. Owing to the number of encores, the trebles showed signs of fatigue towards the close of the evening, and began to sing flatly. This could not be wondered at, considering the severe strain put upon them, and it is much to be regretted that the practice of allowing any number of encores remains in force at these Concerts. "In dulci jubilo" was deli-ciously sung, as was also "Fly hence with me," but it is almost invidious to particularise where all was so good. The Concert was in every respect a great success, and we offer our hearty congratulations to Mr. Rootham, the Conductor, on the result of his careful rehearsals.

Colston Hall on the roth inst. The performers engaged are as follows: -Mdlle. Marie Marimon, Miss Jennie Dickerson, Mr. H. Guy, Mr. Barrington Foote, Mr. Farley Sinkins, vocalists; solo pianoforte, Signor Tito Mattei; solo violin, Signor Papini; solo violoncello, Mons. de Munck; solo cornet, Mr. Howard Reynolds; solo contra-basso, Signor Bottesini. The annual "Ladies' Night" of the Orpheus Glee programme will be given. The Plymouth Vocal Association is preparing a Handel Selection for the bi-centenary, and Gade's "Crusaders" for the next Concert.

The Sarum Choral Society will perform Handel's

"Messiah" at the Easter Concert.

Organ Recitals were given in the Victoria Hall, Exeter, by Mr. D. J. Wood, on December 20, and on the 3rd, 10th and 31st ult.; two by Mr. G. W. Lyon, on December 26; and one on the 24th ult. by Mr. J. White, of Teignmouth.

MUSIC IN EDINBURGH.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

HAVING closed my last letter rather earlier in the month than usual, I could not notice some important Concerts occurring towards the end of the year, and for the sake of continuity I should like to say a few words about them. On the 22nd December the third of the Choral Union Concerts took place in the Music Hall, the programme being an orchestral one. Mr. Frederic H. Cowen conducted on this occasion in room of Mr. Manns, and the composer's Cambrian Symphony was not unnaturally selected as the Cambrian Symphony was not unnaturally selected as the leading item of the evening. The general opinion seemed to be that while the music is pleasing, and has special charms for the musical ear, either of a Scotchman or a Welshman, for it is difficult to decide to which nationality the melodic figures incline, the Symphony is rather lacking in spontaneity, though on the other hand it may more likely be abiding than what is at first more taking. Among other selections performed were the Hebrides Overture of Mendelssohn, and the Leonore Overture, No. 3, of Beethoven, the band playing in all with great steadiness under Mr. Cowen's bâton. Herr Franz Rummel took the solo part in Schumann's Piano Concerto, Op. 54, in a manner which proved highly satisfactory to the audience, and also played the Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue by Bach. Not the least important feature of the Concert was the performance of a string quartet-Beethoven, Op. 59, No. 3-which was played by Mr. R. Heckmann's Cologne party with purity and expression. Miss Russell was the vocalist, one of her selections being "Lascia ch' io pianga," from Handel's "Rinaldo." The fourth Concert of the series took place on the 29th December, when Mr. Manns was again at his post. The oldfashioned, though exceedingly tuneful and highly descriptive, Overture, by Méhul, "La chasse du jeune Henri," headed the programme. It was capitally played. The Prelude to A. C. Mackenzie's "Colomba" followed, and obtained a splendid reception. A masterly piece of orchestral writing, and faithfully foreshadowing the Corsican story of revenge, the Overture must now always command a place in programmes of modern instrumental music, and the city of Mr. Mackenzie's birth may well be proud of the composer. Two instrumental movements, from Mr. Mackenzie's new Oratorio "The Rose of Sharon," followed, and excited warm interest. The Symphony was that of Brahms, in F major, Op. 90, his latest and probably his greatest contribution to that department of musical art. Herr Hugo Heerman gave a highly poetic rendering of the chief part in Spohr's Dramatic Concerto for violin and orchestra, his Cantabile playing being much admired. The orchestra ably seconded his efforts. Miss Fröebel (piano) accompanied Herr Heerman in some shorter violin selections, and Miss Thudichum contributed songs.

The last of the Saturday Evening Concerts, in connection with the Literary Institute, took place on the 27th December. The programme was chiefly instrumental, as before, Mr. Dambmann's select orchestra taking a prin-

The fifth Concert of the Choral Union series took place Mr. Buckland announces a grand Concert to be given at on the 5th ult., and there was a large audience. Spohr's Overture to "Jessonda," an opera which might well be revived, was the opening piece. A Notturno, by Dvorák, was performed for the first time, and was followed, as a further example of the distinguished Czech musician, by his very clever and interesting Scherzo Capriccioso. Further on in the Concert came what were undoubtedly the most interesting portions of it, namely, the three instrumental movements from the "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony of Society is announced for the 12th inst., when an attractive Berlioz. The orchestra shone to conspicuous advantage in these excerpts, the Queen Mab scene, in particular, being executed with remarkable delicacy and ability. Mr. Lindsay Deas played two pianoforte selections from Grieg and Sterndale Bennett, and Mr. Joseph Maas sang "Apollo's Invocation to the Muses," written for him by Massenet.

Mendelssohn's Oratorio, "St. Paul," was performed by the Choral Union on the 12th ult., being the sixth Concert of the series. Madame Clara Samuell, Miss Hope Glenn, Mr. Henry Guy, Mr. Barrington Foote, and Mr. H. Sanderson, were the solo vocalists. The choir, if a little unsteady in the earlier numbers, was subsequently all that could be wished for. Mr. T. H. Collinson, who is rapidly advancing as a Conductor, very successfully directed the performance. There was a very crowded attendance.

The seventh Concert (on the 19th ult.) was again an orchestral one. The most notable selection was from the music by Rubinstein to the ballet called "The Grape," the lively character of which made it especially happy for the conclusion of the programme, where it was placed. Italy, Hungary, and France were represented in their vine products, the characteristics of the respective vintages being musically illustrated in national dance rhythms with the genius that might be looked for. The symphony of the evening was Haydn's No. 9 in the Salomon set. The quasi-symphony by Schumann, entitled Overture, Scherzo, and Finale, was also in the programme. Herr Barth made his first appearance before an Edinburgh audience in the Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, No. 5, in E flat, by Beethoven, and made a distinct impression, although it may with justice be said that he lacks what is termed virtuosity. Herr Barth also played Impromotu No. 3 by Schubert, and Characterstück No. 7 by Mendelssohn. Miss Hilda Coward, as the vocalist of the evening, made a most promising appearance.

The programme of the eighth Concert was partly commemorative of Mozart's natal day, January 27, 1756, and was as representative of the composer as the limits assigned would permit of. The examples of his works comprised Symphony in C, No. 6, called the Linz; an excerpt from the Clarinet Concerto, Mr. J. Egerton being the solo executant; the Overture "The Magic Flute," and the aria "Dove Sono." The rest of the programme was from other composers, and included Concerto for Violin and Orchestra in D, Op. 67, Beethoven (Mr. J. T. Carrodus, solo violin), and Finale from Symphony No. 10 in C by Schubert.

Mr. Charles Hallé and Madame Norman Néruda gave a Pianoforte and Violin Recital on the 10th ult. Schubert's grand Sonata for Piano, in D, Op. 53, Bach's Chaconne in D minor, and Schumann's "Triple Romance" for piano and violin, Op. 94, were among the pieces played by these incomparable artists.

The St. Andrew's Amateur Orchestral Society gave its first Concert in the Literary Institute Hall on the 13th ult. The orchestra numbered about sixty. Mr. J. C. Paton conducted. The Overture to "Fra Diavolo" and Haydn's No. 7 Symphony were essayed with very fair success by the amateur executants. Solos on the violin and violoncello were contributed by Mr. W. Waddell and Mr. Paton, and songs by Miss M. Knowles, contralto. Altogether the Society may be considered to have made a capital start.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW.

On New Year's Day, the chief annual Scotch holiday, St. Andrew's Hall was crowded, as usual, largely with visitors from the country, to listen to what may almost be called the yearly statutory performance, by the Choral Union, of Handel's "Messiah." Formerly, as regards the manner in which the New Year's Day oratorio, or sacred selection Concert, was presented, the Union could seldom be said to be in good trim, so common was absenteeism. Of late years, however, there has been greater conscientiousness of attendance on the first day of the year; the parts, as a rule, being as well represented then as on other occasions. The "Messiah," of which the present was the eighteenth annual performance, was produced as near to perfection as possible. At all events, I am not aware of there ever having been a more thoroughly satisfactory rendering of Handel's great work in our city. The tone of the chorus was not only full and round, but clear and neat, the phrasing and expression being notably good, while the orchestra, under the firm controlling hand of Mr. Manns, was all that could be desired in accompanying. Miss Thudichum, Miss M. Mackenzie, Mr. Joseph Maas, and Mr. W. H. Brereton were the solo vocalists, and Dr. Peace presided at the organ. In the evening, to a comparatively small audience, a Concert of miscellaneous vocal and instrumental selections was given, including, however, such important items as the unfinished Symphony of Schubert and the Overture to "Oberon." On the next following Concert, on the 3rd ult., continuing the regular Saturday night series, Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony was played, among other selections of note, the hall being crowded in every

Continuing the subscription series of Orchestral Concerts, that of Tuesday evening, the 6th ult., embraced the Overture to Spohr's "Jessonda"-the tuneful and expressive music being evidently thoroughly enjoyed—also three movements from the "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony, or by whatever name, from its composite character, it may be whatever mane, from its Composite values of the described. Miss Agnes Zimmermann, her first appearance at these Concerts, was solo pianist, and left a most excellent impression, proving the abiding genuine attractiveness of the purer school of pianoforte writing as exemplified in the music performed, the pieces being Mozart's Concerto in D minor and Sterndale Bennett's Barcarole from the Fourth Concerto and Rondo piacevole. On the following Saturday evening, the 10th ult., Spontini's Overture to his "Olympie," Raff's "Lenore" Symphony, in its entirety, and Sterndale Bennett's Overture, "The Naiads," were the most notable numbers. The Symphony was most effectively played. The Adagio from Beethoven's Septet, not so familiar a number as the Andante, was played with a very fair measure of success, considering that the performers have not been in the habit of studying chamber music together. Madame Clara Samuell was the vocalist of the evening. The Subscription Concert of the 13th ult. was of a distinctive character, inasmuch as half of the programme consisted of selections from J. S. Bach. The principal numbers were the Cha-conne for violin, played by Herr Heckmann; the air "My heart ever faithful," sung by Madame Samuell; and the Largo movement from the D minor Concerto for two violins. Beethoven's No. 5 Symphony in C minor was the principal feature of the second part. At the opening of the Symphony the accentuation seemed to be a little indefinite, but, on the whole, the performance of this characteristic work was a very good one. The next Concert, on the 17th ult., comprised Weber's Overture "Ruler of the Spirits," Mozart's Symphony in E flat (played with spirit and grace), and "Bacchanal," from the music by Rubinstein to the ballet "The Vine"; this last being of the most exciting character, an orgie of sound, indeed, from beginning to end.

At the immediately following Concert, on the 20th ult., another number was performed from Rubinstein's "Vine" music, namely, "The tasting of the wines," in which the composer employs appropriate national characteristics of melody to describe the nature and effect of different products of the grape. This is a most attractive excerpt from the ballet music, and made a capital conclusion to the Concert, which, it should be added, included Haydn's lively Symphony (No. 9), as also the Concert for piano by Beethoven (No. 5, in E flat), in which Herr Heinrich

The interest excited by last year's performance of Berlioz's "Messe des morts" led to its being included in the present series, the second production of this original and very remarkable work having accordingly taken place on the 22nd ult., before a very crowded audience. In judging of the performance, one must consider, first, the difficulty of the work, and, second, the peculiar conditions under which, for due effect, it must take place. The difficulty is as much one of management as of technical character, and undoubtedly the Requiem should be heard in the solemn circumstances intended by the composer, and not in the concert-room. We are not the less indebted, however, to the Choral Union of Glasgow, and primarily to Mr. Manns, for the opportunity of listening to music which otherwise would probably have remained unknown to the general public. On the occasion of the second performance, the orchestra numbered 120 performers, the chief additions to the usual strength being in the wood, wind, and brass instruments, and in the instruments of percussion, which latter take an altogether peculiar part in the orchestral accompaniments. With the chorus, there were in all 400 executants on the platform, the stipulated proportions of orchestra and voices being fairly well maintained. The choral singing was a great improvement on last year. The "Lachry-mosa" was this time steady and decided, and there was throughout a much clearer apprehension of the dramatic character of the music, as well as a greater measure of artistic interpretation. The unaccompanied semi-chorus "Quærens me" was sung excellently in time. orchestra played with remarkable precision and steadiness, nearly every point being promptly taken up in obedience to the bâton of Mr. Manns, who seemed to be in his element in directing the varied and peculiar forces under his command. Mr. Holberry Hagyard was the tenor vocalist, and gave an impassioned delivery of the solo in the "Sanctus." Taken altogether, this the second performance in Scotland of the "Requiem" was a very great

The programme of the 24th ult. comprised chiefly the "Harold in Italy" Symphony by Berlioz, the viola solo part played by Herr T. Allelrotte, a member of the orchestra. It contained also a little piece by Mr. W. T. Hoeck, "On the water," which was played at the Crystal Palace recently. In the programme of the Subscription Concert of the 27th ult. were included the Symphony in C, by Mozart, composed at Linz, besides some other selections in memory of Mozart, who was born on January 27, 1756, There were also among miscellaneous selections the Concerto for violin and orchestra in D by Beethoven, the solo part by Mr. J. T. Carrodus.

Scarcely any other Concerts of importance took place last month besides those by the Choral Union. One by the Pollokshields Musical Association claims notice, however, by reason of an attractive presentation of Hofmann's Cantata "Cinderella," given on the 9th ult., in Govanhill Burgh Hall. A chief feature of the Cantata is the orchestration, and this was well brought out by the excellent party of executants, which included members of the Choral Union orchestra. The solos were very well rendered and the choruses were not less successfully sung. Mr. Hoeck conducted.

An operetta called "The Uhlans" was performed at the Royalty Theatre, for the first time here, on the 19th ult. The libretto, which has the somewhat rare merit of being perfectly unobjectionable, is by Mr. W. McIvor Morrison, of Dublin, and the music is by Mrs. Morrison. The latter portion of the work is tuneful, the choruses being above the average. The company included Madame Rose Hersee, Mr. J. W. Turner, and Mr. Charles Lyall. Herr Franz Groenings conducted.

The Dumbarton Choral Union gave a performance of "Judas Maccabæus," on December 23. They had the assistance of a small orchestra, led by Mr. Cole, and the chief vocalists were Mrs. Haden and Mr. A. Black. The choral singing showed a marked improvement on that of former seasons. The performance was under the direction of Mr. James Mitchell, who has been recently appointed to the post of Conductor.

the post of Conductor.
Gadsby's "Lord of the Isles" was very successfully produced by the Paisley Choral Union, on the 15th ult.
The accompaniments were played by the band of the Glasgow Choral Union Concerts. Mr. Manns conducted.

Mr. Joshua Ives, Mus. Bac., Cantab., who has been resident in Glasgow for a few years, has been appointed Professor of Music in the University of Adelaide. To mark their respect for Mr. Ives, his music pupils in the Glasgow Athenæum presented him, on the 6th ult., with a purse of sovereigns and an illuminated address, congratulating their late teacher on his appointment to so important a position, and wishing him every success in his new sphere.

CHESTER TRIENNIAL MUSICAL FESTIVAL

By an advertisement in our present number we are reminded that, in our article last month upon the principal coming events of the year, we inadvertently omitted mention of the Festival in Chester Cathedral, which was established as far back as 1786, and continued until 1829. After a lapse of fifty years it was revived in 1879 as a triennial Festival, by the exertions of the Rev. C. Hylton Stewart (Precentor) and Dr. J. C. Bridge (Organist). The forthcoming Festival will extend over three days, July 22, 23, and 24, and will be of exceptional interest, the works to be performed including Gounod's "Redemption," Bach's Motett, "Blessing, Glory," "Daniel," a new Oratorio by Dr. Joseph C. Bridge, Rossini's "Stabat Mater," Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," and Handel's "Messiah." Miscellaneous evening Concerts will be given at the Music Hall, Berlioz's "Faust" and Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony" being amongst the important compositions in the selection. The vocalists are Miss Anna Williams, Miss Mary Davies, Madame Patey, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. Joseph Maas, Mr. Brereton, and Mr. Santley. The band will consist principally of members of Mr. C. Halle's orchestra, and will be led by Herr Straus. The Festival Chorus will be drawn mainly from Chester. Conductor, Dr. Joseph C. Bridge, M.A., Organist of the Cathedral.

As any contrivance calculated to lessen the difficulties of playing the violin is important, we draw attention to the "Spohr adjustable Chinholder for the Violin or Viola"manufactured by Messrs. Jenour Brothers. Louis Spohr says in his Violin School:—"The modern style of playing, in which the left hand changes its position so often, requires absolutely that the violin should be held firmly with the chin. To do this in an unconstrained manner and without bending down the head is very difficult, whether the chin be laid on the right or the left side of the tail-piece or on the tail-piece itself. There is also a perpetual risk of drawing away the violin from under the chin in shifting the left hand rapidly downwards from the higher positions, or of disturbing the evenness of the bowing by the instrument being unsteadied; all these evils are completely rectified by the violin-holder. Besides securing a firm and unconstrained hold of the violin, it has this advantage, that the player is not compelled to rest his chin on the sound-board or the tail-piece, thereby checking the vibration of these parts, to the detriment of the sonority and volume of tone of the instrument." All the requirements mentioned here by the great master are to be found in this new Chinholder. It can be adjusted exactly over the tail-piece, or on the left-hand side of it, and has the important advantage that it can be raised or lowered to suit any deviation in the thickness of the ribs of different instruments, so that it will fit any violin or viola.

Messrs. Obach and Co., of Cockspur Street, Pall Mall, have recently published a photo-engraving, from the original by Papperitz, representing Richard Wagner at Bayreuth. The likeness of the great composer is extremely striking; and the portrait of the Abbé Liszt, who sits at the pianoforte, cannot fail to be instantly recognised by all who have ever seen him. The now familiar figures of the artists who have identified themselves with Wagner's works are grouped around, and form a picture in the highest degree interesting, and one which should be in the possession of all who would retain a memorial of the eminent musical reformer, as well as of those who have so nobly realised his immortal creations.

THE "Park" Branch of the Central Musical Studio, in its prospectus for the season, announces a series of six alternate Musical Evenings and Matinées, two of which have been given during the past month, and the rest will take place during February and March. The Concerts, which are under the direction of the Principal, Mr. W. J. Bailey, are given at Carlton Road, Upper Tollington Park, and the admission is by ticket only.

ON March 14, the first performance of M. Gounod's "Troisième Messe Solennelle (de Pâques)" will take place at the Church of St. Eustache, Paris, the occasion being the annual mass of the free schools.

MR. H. H. STATHAM gave an interesting Lecture on "Form and Design in Music," at the London Institution, on Monday afternoon, the 19th ult. Mr. Statham illustrated his subject by playing on the pianoforte extracts from the works of Bach, Mozart, Beethoven, &c. The lecture occupied exactly one hour, and as the musical illustrations took up a considerable portion of time, Mr. Statham could not pretend to give more than an outline of his views, which appeared to be in the highest degree orthodox. He divided the question historically into the Ancient, or non-Rhythmical School; the Horizontal, or modern Contrapuntal School; and the Vertical and more recent Harmonic School, in which the melodic individuality of the parts is not so accentuated. Mr. Statham gave a short example on the pianoforte of what seemed to represent an extract from a present-day anthem or festival chant; and this he called the "Hop, skip, and a jump" school; evidently a branch of the Vertical, that possesses, as he said, the characteristic of retaining the same harmony, or one chord, for two or three bars' duration. In eulogy and explanatory of the older contrapuntal methods, Mr. Statham read and had to interpret a long passage from Spitta's "Life of Bach." The lecturer traced, in the usual manner, the origin of modern instrumental forms from dance music-the "suite," and so on; and reexplained the sonata form, giving, from Mozart's G minor Symphony, practical examples of subject, "bridge," second subject, coda, episode, &c. Mr. Statham draws largely on the sister art of architecture for terms illustrative of the details of a musical structure, in which we are asked to find forms analogous to architraves and storeys, and to cornices divided by "strong lines." A single chord, figurated or arpeggioed, "supporting," as Professor Macfarren, amongst others, says, a melodic superstructure.

Mr. Statham has baptised an "ornamental background," which, as a mere name, serves comme les autres; but unhappily it assists us little in a small matter giving some trouble to theorists. It is part of that "vertical system" which it is difficult to understand how Mr. Statham can press into the question of "form" in any way, except remotely, as part of modulation, a subject he had not time to treat thoroughly. He rightly reminded us-but only in parenthesis-that music is separated from all analogy to architecture in respect to one attribute he called "extension," that is, the gradual unfolding of the form; which, moreover, may be said, by a figure of speech, to be written in air, and, were it not for the help of the memory, it might as well be written in water. The few diagrams and examples in the staff notation Mr. Statham exhibited on the blackboard would, if systematically extended, have made the elements of musical structure visible and intelligible. It might be suggested to him, as well as to all lecturers on the subject, that it is from such visual aids we derive most benefit. The illustrations addressed to us through the medium of a pianoforte may afford an agreeable relief to the lecturers themselves, and may amuse those amongst the audience least prepared to comprehend the question of form; but for most elementary and explanatory purposes the musical performances result in sheer waste of time. They may in this instance have contributed to the pleasure of Mr. Statham's hearers. The theatre of the Institution was well filled, and the explanations and comments of the lecturer were followed with marked attention.

THE North-East London Choral Society gave an excellent Concert on Wednesday evening, the 21st ult., at Morley Hall, Hackney. The programme comprised Dr. J. F. Bridge's Motett "Hymn to the Creator," Spohr's Cantata "Christian's Prayer," and a miscellaneous selection. Vocalists, Miss Agnes Larkcom, Miss Lottie West, Mr. Albert James, and Mr. T. Lawler, Jun.; Mr. Arthur Payne (violin), Mr. C. E. Smith (organ), and Mr. Louis B. Prout (pianoforte): Conductor, Mr. John E. West. There was a very good attendance.

THE "Indicator," an annual of Art and Music, is a Christmas number of a weekly periodical published in Chicago, which appears in every respect to be excellently conducted. Like most holiday offerings, it contains numerous illustrations, some of which are extremely attractive.

On the 6th ult., Mr. Lennox Browne, the well known throat surgeon, read a paper on "The influence of Alcohol and Tobacco in relation to Voice Use," at the rooms of the Medical Society of London. In proof that alcohol was not necessary as a curative agent in throat disease as suggested by one author, the statistics of the Central London Throat and Ear Hospital were quoted, which showed that in the last seven years 1,016 in-patients had been treated, of whom 777 had suffered from throat disease, and the total expenditure on alcoholic stimulants in that period amounted only to £8 7s. id. In one year, 1881, the amount was only one shilling. The paper was illustrated by a valuable series of statistics, based on the replies of 380 professional vocalists to a set of questions addressed to them by the author. Of this number it was found that 254, exactly two-thirds, acknowledged to the habit of taking alcoholic stimulants, and 126, one-third, to rarely or ever so indulging. Of this last number 101, or 26.58 per cent., claimed to be total abstainers, and amongst them were some of the most eminent singers in our Cathedrals and Chapels Royal. Although urging upon all those who may be termed voice-users, the desirability of exercising much caution in taking alcohol, the lecturer was extremely liberal in his treatment of the subject, acknowledging that the desire for food after singing or acting until late in the night, almost necessitated partaking of hearty suppers, and that moderate alcoholic stimulants were then allowable " for the double purpose of aiding digestion and of diminishing the amount of solid food taken." In view of the time at disposal, the question of tobacco had to be treated with brevity. Of the 380 singers from whom the above statistics had been taken, it was shown that 180, or 47'3 per cent., were smokers; 63, or 16 per cent., were nonsmokers; 44, or 11.6 per cent., indulged in tobacco but rarely; and 38, or 10 per cent., practised the habit with "great moderation." Of the 101 abstainers, 20 per cent. "great moderation." Of the 107 absumbles, and 15 per were smokers, 66 per cent. were non-smokers, and 15 per cent. seknowledged to occasionally smoking. The excuse for tobacco was thought to be less reasonable even than that for alcohol, and this article was, as a rule, decidedly pernicious to the throat and voice.

The following are lists of the candidates who have passed the recent examinations in Music at the University of London. Intermediate Examination in Music.—Examiners: Prof. Carey Foster, B.A., F.R.S., Dr. Pole, F.R.S., Prof. Reinold, M.A., F.R.S., Dr. Stainer, M.A. First Division.—Samuel Alexander Herzberg, private study; Arthur Watson, private study; Second Division—Arthur William George Ent Gooch, private study; Charles Livermore, private study; William Alfred Todhunter, M.A., private study; Herbert Westerby, private study. B.Mus. Examination.—Examiners: Dr. Pole, F.R.S., and Dr. Stainer, M.A. First Division—Joseph Curtis, private tuition. Intermediate D.Mus. Examination.—Examiners: Prof. Carey Foster, B.A., F.R.S., Dr. Pole, F.R.S., prof. Reinold, M.A., F.R.S., Dr. Stainer, M.A. First Division—Charles John Hall, private study; Augustus Hayter Walker, private study.

On Sunday, the 11th ult., a selection from the "Messiah" was given at the Royal Military Chapel, Wellington Barracks, under the direction of Mr. Richard Lemaire, Precentor of the Chapel. There was a complete Orchestra of thirty performers; the wind instruments being played by members of the Guards bands and the strings by members of the leading London orchestras. The bass solos were sung by Mr. Henry Pyatt, and those for alto by Mr. Kingston. The choruses were admirably rendered by the large choir. The chapel was crowded in every part, hundreds being unable to gain admission. On Mid-Lent Sunday, we believe, Mr. Lemaire intends performing either the Passion Music from the "Messiah," or Mendelssobn's "Christus."

The two prizes of one hundred dollars and fifty dollars respectively, offered by the Apollo Musical Club, of Chicago, for the two best four-part songs with English words, for male voices, unaccompanied, have both been awarded to Mr. Harry Rowe Shelley, of Brooklyn, for his settings of "The Minstrel Boy" and "The Castanet Song." Sixtysix MSS. were sent in for competition. Messrs. Philo A. Otis, William L. Tomlins, H. Balatka, and Clarence Eddy, formed the committee of award.

On Tuesday evening, the 20th ult., Miss Alice Alool brought to a successful termination her fourth series of excellent Pianoforte Recitals at Brixton Hall. Miss Aloof's soil, which were interpreted in a highly artistic manner, were Beethoven's pianoforte Sonata in E flat major, Op. 27, No. 2, Grieg's Berceuse, Op. 38, Raff's Rigaudon, Op. 204, and, as an encore, a Lied ohne Worte (Mendelssohn), Miss Aloof was also associated with Mr. Ernest Crooke in an able rendering of Beethoven's Sonata in D major, Op. 12, No. 1, and in Moszkowski's Bolero, Op. 16, No. 2, for pianoforte and violin. Leonard's fantasia "Hommage a Haydn" was played by Mr. E. Crooke, and received with acclamation. The interspersed vocal music was effectively supported by Miss Edith Aloof, Miss Spencer Jones, and Mr. Henry Guy, and Mr. John Harrison accompanied with his accustomed proficiency. Miss Aloof should be congratulated upon the success which has attended her Recitals, which have been considerably above the level of the average local Concert.

A CONCERT of a highly successful character was given by Mr. James Budd at Brixton Hall, on Monday evening, the zzth ult. Mr. Budd obtained, as usual, a hearty reception for each of his songs, which were both new, "Peggy of Yarmouth Town." (Bevan) and "A Sailor's Life" (Levey). The remaining vocalists were Madame Worrell, Madame Adeline Paget, Miss Annie Matthews Madame Raymond, Miss Pauline Featherby, and Messrs, Arthur Thompson, J. Dalgety Henderson, Frederick Bevan, Rushton Odell, and Fred. Cozens. Soli for pianoforte and oboe were contributed by Mrs. Rushton Odell and Mr. George Horton (of H.M. private band) respectively. The duties of accompanist were divided between Mr. Turle Lee, Mr. Michael Watson, Mr. John Harrison, and Miss Ellen Bliss. The St. Paul's (West Brixton) Choral Society sang during the evening, under the conductorship of Mr. M. Higgs.

A MEETING of the general committee of the Norwich Musical Festival was recently held at Norwich; Mr. R. T. Gurdon, M.P., in the chair. The accounts showed that, including a balance of \pounds_4 0 brought forward from the Festival of 1881, the receipts from all sources had been \pounds_4 7723. After payment of all expenses a balance of \pounds_953 remained available for distribution among the local charities, and it was resolved to distribute the bulk of it accordingly. It appeared from the accounts that the amount paid to the principal vocal performers at the Festival was $\pounds_1,155$, that the cost of the instrumental band had been \pounds_866 , and that of the chorus \pounds_279 . The sum of \pounds_418 was also expended in fitting up St. Andrew's Hall for the Festival. The proceedings closed with the customary vote of thanks.

THE arrangements for the great Handel Bi-centenary Festival, at the Crystal Palace, are being rapidly pushed forward. The following singers have already been engaged: Madame Albani, Miss Annie Marriott, Madame Valleria, Madame Patey, and Madame Trebelli; Mr. Edward Lloyd, and probably Mr. Maas, Signor Foli, Mr. Bridson, Mr. F. King, and Mr. Santley. Mr. Manns will conduct, and the band and chorus will be on the usual extensive scale. The dates will be June 19, 22, 24, and 26, the first day being allotted to the grand full rehearsal, the "Messiah" and "Israel" being fixed respectively for the 22nd and 26th, and the selection day, which will witness some interesting novelties, for the 24th.

On the 12th ult. Mr. Alfred Kenningham's annual Concert took place at the Kensington Town Hall, before a large audience. The singing of the bineficiaire was much admired, his new song, "The hour of love," being redemanded. The other vocalists were Miss Julia Jones, Mdlle. Giulia Velmi, Miss Emily Dones, Madame Florence Winn, Mr. Thurley Beale, and Mr. T. W. Hanson. Miss Rosamund Gillum (pianoforte) and Madame Perkins (violin) also contributed solos with decided success.

Handel's "Samson" was given by the Erith Choral Society on the 15th ult, under the direction of Mr. Richard Lemaire. The performance was excellent, a small but very efficient orchestra, led by Mr. Halfpenny, adding much to the success. Mr. Sidney Naylor accompanied, and the solo vocalists were Miss Ambler, Miss Dones, Mr. Kenningham, Mr. Whillier, and Mr. Brereton.

A NUMBER of the lady friends and pupils of Mr. Lazarus, the eminent clarinet performer, presented him on the occasion of his 70th birthday—New Year's Day—with a diamond ring, engraved with his initials, to be worn as a souvenir, a silver-mounted purse (also engraved with his initials) containing the balance of the united contributions, and an album, bearing name and date in gilt letters, in which was written a short address of congratulation to Mr. Lazarus, and the signature of the contributors. This graceful tribute to the talent and excellent social qualities of one of our most gifted artists would doubtless have been much more extensively subscribed to had the secret of the presentation not been so rigidly preserved.

THE Grosvenor Choral Society gave its 155th Concert at the Grosvenor Hall, Buckingham Palace Road, on the 16th ult., assisted by the London Orchestral Society. The vocalists were Miss Madeleine Kelley, Miss Jeanie Rosse, and Mr. Iver McKay: solo violinist, Mr. H. C. Tonking, solo pianist, Mr. Septimus Webbe, both of whom were very successful. The choral singing was highly satisfactory, Schumann's "Gipsy Life," with orchestral accompaniment, being a special feature. Mrs. T. P. Frame accompanied and Mr. David Woodhouse conducted with their usual ability.

A CONCERT of Sacred Music was given in the Church-in-the-Grove, Sydenham, on the 21st ult., the occasion being the re-opening of the organ after restoration and enlargement. Mr. C. Warwick Jordan, Mus. Bac., was the Organist, and his selection, admirably played, was calculated to bring out the capabilities of the instrument most satisfactorily. The vocalists were Miss Kathleen Grant, Miss Alice Grey, Mr. Charles Chilley, and Mr. J. Smyth, all of whom were much appreciated. The organ has been reconstructed by Messrs. Bate & Co., of Burdett Road.

A New three-manual organ has just been erected by A. Gern, of Notting Hill, in St. Stephen's Church, Ealing, on the tubular pneumatic system, which enables the keyboard to be placed in a console near the chancel, though the instrument stands in the south transept. The organ was opened on the 25th ult. by Dr. C. J. Frost, who, in addition to playing the two services, gave a Recital after each, and exhibited to advantage the admirable qualities of the instrument.

The 192nd Monthly Concert of the St. George's Glee Union was held at the Pimlico Rooms, on the 2nd ult. The programme was miscellaneous, and included songs by Miss Maud Cameron, Miss Nellie Watts, Miss Clara Myers, Mr. Courtice Pounds, and Mr. J. D. Balfe, and several part-songs by the choir. The accompaniments were played by Mr. F. R. Kinkee, and Mr. Joseph Monday conducted.

MESSRS. M. HARDCASTLE and H. L. King gave their first annual Evening Concert, in the large Schoolroom, Balmes Road, Southgate Road, on Monday, the 19th ult. Mr. Aynsty's orchestra played with much spirit, and Miss Clara Marni, R.A.M., received encores for both her songs. The other vocalists were Mrs. Hardcastle, Miss Harrison, Mrs. Warner, Messrs. J. Ayrey, and Vincent Wentworth. The Concert was thoroughly appreciated.

On Friday afternoon, the 27th inst., there will be a Matinée of Schubert's music at the Princes Hall, Piccadilly, when Miss Zimmermann and Herr Joachim will play the Fantasia in C major, and Herr von Zur-Mühlen will sing selections from the Winterreise and Schöne Mühlerin, other pieces, both vocal and instrumental, being included in the programme.

AT St. Matthews, New Kent Road, after the evening service on the 4th ult., a successful performance was given of a new Cantata, "The Nativity," composed by the Organist and Director of the Choir, Mr. Edgar Pettman, R.A.M. The solos were effectively sung by Miss Goodall and Mr. Leonard Barnes, R.A.M.

THE Organ Recitals at Bow are now resumed. Several of our leading Organists will play during the season, and on the 14th inst. M. Alex, Guilmant will give the Recital.

DR. ORWIN has been appointed Physician to the Guildhall School of Music, in succession to the late Dr. Llewellyn Thomas.

A VERY successful Concert was given on the 12th ult., in connection with St. Stephen's Church, Putney. The artists were amateurs, with the exception of Mr. Joseph Heald, who was highly successful in all his songs. Mr. E. M. Flavell accompanied in a careful manner. The Toy Symphony was well played, and encored.

On Tuesday the 13th ult., an Organ Recital, interspersed with vocal music, was given at Stepney Meeting House by Mr. J. Douglas Macey, Organist of Hampstead Congregational Church. Several violin solos were ably rendered by Signor Luigi Meo, and a duet for violin and organ (Henderson), first time of performance, was well received.

On Friday evening, the 24th ult., after the usual weekly rehearsal of the choir at St. John the Evangelist, Waterloo Road, the Vicar, on behalf of the choir and congregation, presented Mr. Henry J. B. Dart, Organist and Choirmaster to the Church, with a handsome silver card-tray suitably inscribed, on the occasion of his wedding.

The Penzance Choral Society proposes commemorating the bi-centenary of Handel by giving a grand Festival performance on Easter Monday, April 6. Three of the great composer's works have been selected—viz.," Utrecht Jubilate," "Zadok the Priest," and the "Ode on Cecilia's Day."

THE Brothers Holden, the young violinists who met with so favourable a reception some time since at St. James's Hail, appeared at the City Temple Concerts, on the 8th ult., with unqualified success. They were well supported by Madame Mass as accompanist.

UNDER the conductorship of Mr. J. H. Maunder, the second Smoking Concert of the season in connection with the Civil Service Vocal Union was given at the Freemasons' Tavern, Great Queen Street, on Thursday evening, the 15th ult.

THE Kyrle Choir gave a performance of "The Creation" in St. Barnabas Church, Edgware Road, on the 2rst ult. The soloists were Miss Alice Fripp, Mr. Harry Yates, and Mr. James Blackney. Mr. Malcolm Lawson conducted, and Mr. E. H. Turpin accompanied on the organ.

MR. PRITCHARD gave a successful Concert at the Belmont Institution, Battersea, on the 14th ult., the artists being Miss Emily Pritchard, Madame Shelley, Messrs. W. Webb, Ernest A. Williams, and A. G. Pritchard, vocalists; and W. Abbott, violin.

Mr. George Addock announces a Handel Bi-centenary Festival in Baxter Gate Chapel, Loughborough, on the 23rd inst., the principal vocalists engaged being Madame Lita Jarratt, Miss Fanny Lymn, Mr. A. Castings, and Mr. E. Jackson. There will be an efficient band and chorus.

AT SS. Peter and Paul's Catholic Church, Clerkenwell, on Christmas Day, the choir sang Weber's Mass in G, Novello's "Adeste Fideles," and Handel's "Hallelujah," accompanied by full orchestra. Signor Santo Arrigoni conducted, and Mr. B. B. Barrett presided at the organ.

In our notice of Madame Sainton-Dolby's Concert last month the name of the young violinist who created so favourable an impression should have been Miss Winifred Robinson.

REVIEWS.

Autobiography of Hector Berlioz. Translated by Rachel (Scott Russell) Holmes and Eleanor Holmes. In two volumes. [Macmillan and Co.]

As a rule the lives of musicians are not of general interest, but these Memoirs will be found unusually pleasant reading, even by people who care little about music, or understand little about the technicalities of art. When Berlioz was nearly twenty years old, he left his home in the department of the Isère, and went to Paris. He was to follow his father's profession, that of a doctor. Of a morning he went to the lectures of Thénard and Gay-Lussac, or to the dissecting-room; of an evening to the opera. But he soon heard of the musical library of the Conservatoire, and he says: "Once I entered that sanctuary I never quitted it. It was the death-blow to my medical career, and the dissecting-room was finally abandoned." One night, after hearing "Iphigènie en Tauride," he vowed that, come what might, he would be a musician. Both his parents were opposed to his wish. A hot and angry correspondence between his father and himself culminated in a perfect fury of passion, and his mother cursed him. For seven or eight years he led a precarious life in Paris. He seven or eight years he led a precarious life in Paris. had a few pupils at a franc a lesson, he became chorus-singer at a second-rate theatre, lived "in a cheap little room on the fifth storey," and frequently dined off dry bread and prunes. But all the time he was working hard at music, and at length, after several failures, in 1830 he won the first prize at the Conservatoire. This secured to him a yearly pension of 3,000 francs for five years. As laureate he had to go to the Academy at Rome. He made excursions into the Abruzzi Mountains, to Naples, Florence, and other places, idled away his timefor the Director, Horace Vernet, exercised no sort of control over the students' work-and in his Memoirs confesses that he wrote but little music. In 1832 he returned to Paris, and produced his Symphonie Fantastique and "Lelio," With this work or works is associated what Berlioz calls "the grand drama of my life." Before going to Italy he had seen Henrietta Smithson as Ophelia in "Hamlet," and he resolved to woo and win her. Berlioz had an impressionable heart; already, at the age of twelve, he had failen in love, desperately and hopelessly, with a certain fair Estelle. Hopelessly indeed, for the young lady married another; and desperately, for when, nearly fifty years later, they met again, the lady a widow and Berlioz doubly a widower, a long life of bitter trials and disappointments had not cooled the ardour of his passion. Berlioz married Miss Smithson, he seemed about to enter upon a life of happiness. He had not forgotten the fair Estelle, but he really loved his Henrietta. The marriage was an unfortunate one; there must have been faults on both sides. "He who so tormented thee and so suffered through thee" are the mournful words which escaped his lips when he followed his poor dead wife to her resting place—not her last, for eight years afterwards Berlioz tells us of the "dark, gloomy morning" when, owing to the abolishment of the smaller Montmartre cemetery her remains had to be removed, and he had to be present at the disinterment. We have dwelt on this sad story of love and misery because it certainly affected Berlioz's career as an artist. He was of a passionate, ardent disposition. Gluck's scores first fascinated him; then the delicious freshness and wild subtle fragrance of Weber's music intoxicated him, and the Symphonies of Beethoven sent a shock through his nervous system. He became enthusiastic, ambitious; he "exhaled music through every pore" and composed with a quick and burning pen; and when, in addition to the influences of these mighty masters, love filled his heart, and the adored one revealed to him the genius of Shakespeare, and thus opened to him a universe of poetry, it seemed as if the fates were guiding him on to happiness and fame. But his mother's curse clave to him; his home became desolate; he was unsuccessful—his "Benvenuto Cellini" was "hissed with admirable energy and unanimity," his splendid work "Faust" was a failure, and "Les Troyens" was only a success d'estime. His genius flashed out at times; he wrote "Harold," his Requiem, his Te Deum, and a few other works; but the springs of his life were poisoned when he discovered love's dream was an illusion: he gradually became more sad and more morose, and the terrible words near the close of his autobiography show the state of his mind five years before his death: "I am in my sixty-first year; I have neither hopes, nor

"I am in my sixty-first year; I have neither hopes, nor illusions, nor great thoughts left. . . . My contempt for the folly and meanness of men, my hatred of their detestable ferocity, are at their height, and I say hourly, 'When death wills! Why does it delay?'"

But if the life of Berlioz was a sorrowful one, his autobiography is not all full of sighs and tears. Though at times serious, at times melancholy, it is yet full of humour and wit, to say nothing of the graphic descriptions of Italian scenery and the interesting letters from Germany and Russia. We can safely leave our readers to find out and enjoy the many pithy sayings, satirical remarks and lively anecdotes in these two volumes; but we would say

He was a vain man, and he knew it; he was a bad-tempered man, and that he fully acknowledges. At a rehearsal, even before anything had occurred to rouse his ill-temper, he says, "I am conscious of a sort of anticipative anger tightening my throat." He was an imprudent man, and of this he also was well aware; he did not always know when to keep silent, and thus made enemies. He showed righteous anger when he found Fétis tampering with the scores of Beethoven's symphonies, but he forgot that "grievous words stir up anger" when he attacked the famous actor in his "Lelio." What was he as a musical critic? Let him speak for himself. When he resigned his post on the Débats he expressed himself as follows: "No more feuilletons to write, no more commonplaces to excuse, no more mediocrities to praise, no more indignation to suppress; no more lies, no more comedies, no more mean compromises-I am free." And who could better describe Berlioz's music than he himself has done? "The prevailing characteristics of my music are passionate expression, intense ardour, rhythmical animation and unexpected effects." His music, indeed, was but a reflection of the man himself. We may congratulate the translators generally on the way in which they have accomplished their difficult task. To reproduce the pathos, the wit, the sarcasm, and the fine essence of Berlioz's writing, without considerable loss, was, of course, impossible; but, taking all the difficulties into consideration, there is much to praise in the English version. Here and there, however, we come across passages which betray carelessness, or even worse. "During the dark ages" is not a satisfactory rendering of "époque de transition crepusculaire"; "wanton insult" is too strong an expression for "petite incartade"; "Maintenant, y sommes-nous" does not mean "Now then, where are ; nor does " a su rendre fort belle une des principales situations" mean "has done full justice to the principal situations. Then the technical expressions are not always exact. Here is one example: Berlioz at a rehearsal points out to a player that he has an E flat instead of an F trumpet.

"Ah," says the latter, "Pardon, je n'avais pas bien lu Pindication." To translate this by "I had not noticed the signature," is incorrect. Trumpet parts are written in the key of C; and the particular crook to be used is noted at the commencement of the piece—e.g., "Trombe in E"; that is the indication. On p. 268 (Vol.I.) a chord is named; the highest note should be B flat, not A flat. On p. 76 (Vol. I.) Berlioz relates a conversation which he overheard. One of the speakers says, "Good God, sir, be calm!" The French is simply "Mon Dieu!" It is wrong to give so strong an expression. The Frenchman's "Mon Dieu!" is, as all the world knows, nothing more than "Dear me!" "Good gracious!" or even "Good heavens!" as we findit properly translated on p. 308 of the same volume. There are a great many foot-notes. Some of these are the author's, some the translators'; but it is not always easy to distinguish between the two. On p. 3 (Vol. II.) the translators have a note of Berlioz about Spontini adding wind instruments to one of Gluck's scores. The translators observe, "Neither Spontini nor Berlioz is likely to last long enough for that; but it is quite possible that some wretch may lay hands on Beethoven. Indeed, it has surely been done already somewhere in Germany." Yes, and they might have added, in England. The foot-note, Vol. II., p. 43, is decidedly unfair. Berlioz does not say that Hummel wrote "many beautiful septets." The translators, too, have left out part of the sentence.

The Great Musicians. Edited by Francis-Hueffer. Schumann. By J. A. Fuller-Maitland. [Sampson Low, Marston, Searle, and Rivington.]

After telling us in the preface to this work that those who expect to find in it a complete and exhaustive life of Robert Schumann will of necessity be disappointed, Mr. Maitland continues thus: "Among the biographies of Schumann, Wasielewski's stands first; with regard to all the facts of the composer's life, it is absolutely reliable, and is also valuable as being founded in great part on personal recollection." He then speaks of the life of the a word or two about Berlioz's estimate of himself and of his order is that upon which the one in the work before us is founded); of the interesting article contributed to Grove's "Dictionary of Music and Musicians," by Dr. Philipp Spitta, since republished in its original German; of the excellent paper on Schumann in Mr. Huefter's "Music of the Future," and of the collection of sketches relating to the master called "Die Davidsbündler," by F. Gustav Jansen, recently published by Breitkopf and Hartel, Leipzig. A careful perusal of Mr. Maitland's book convinces us that the author's own estimate of it is perfectly just; but then, as he admits that the time for writing a perfect biography of Schumann had not yet come, "while so many of the composer's most intimate friends and relations are still living"; that the "bulk of his book cannot boast of much originality, since it is mainly based on the work of others," and that in fact all has been written upon Schumann which, under the circumstances, can be reasonably expected, the question is forced upon us why this book is really wanted. Certainly we have long criticisms upon Schumann's works; but these are scarcely what we expect in the biography of a composer; and although many of the observations are extremely acute, those who anticipate reading something respecting this artist which cannot be found in preceding books will, as the author frankly confesses, be "disappointed." One merit let us freely acknowledge: throughout Mr. Maitland's work he shows that he thoroughly appreciates the bright side of the composer's character, whilst he conceals none of his defects. "In all Schumann's writings," he says, "nothing is more remarkable than his absolute freedom from jealousy, which in his position in relation to Mendelssohn might have been so easily stirred up in a less generous nature." All acquainted with the searching criticisms of this master must fully agree with this observation; and that his admiration of Mendelssohn was sincere may be proved by the fact of his having openly rebuked a musician who spoke slightingly of the composer in his presence, going so far even as to seize him by the shoulders, and then to rush petulantly from the room. We should have been glad if the chapter on "Schumann and his Critics" had been omitted from the book; for no good cause can be served by raking up notices which are now forgotten. It is true that Mr. Maitland does not name the authors of the criticisms from which he quotes, but he sufficiently indicates them to leave little doubt of their identity, and personalities in art works are always out of place.

> Saint Mary. An Oratorio. Composed by Frank J. Sawyer, Mus. Doc., Oxon. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE composer of this work does not state whether it was composed for any special purpose, or merely as a labour of love in one of the highest fields of musical art. In the absence of any evidence to the contrary, we may assume the latter to have been the case. Further, Dr. Sawyer may claim the credit due to the compiler of the libretto, as no other name is mentioned on the titlepage. The book is an arrangement of excerpts from Holy Writ, and from several poets of the highest class, including Longfellow, Keble, Pope, Milman, and Heber. The passages are dovetailed together with much skill, the whole being divided into seven scenes, entitled, respectively, the Annunciation, At St. Elizabeth's Home, the Nativity, the Flight into Egypt, the Wedding in Cana, the Crucifixion, and the Resurrection. The infinite variety in metre and style of the various poetic extracts might be considered hurtful in the sense of rendering the work patchy and wanting in unity of design; but, on the whole, the advantages to the composer outweigh any objections that may be urged against the adoption of a plan of this kind. Opportunities for effective contrast are afforded; and, after all, it is unnecessary that the libretto of an oratorio should be strictly connected or wholly dramatic. Of the music of "St. Mary" it would be unsafe to speak in more than general terms. The perusal of a vocal score may enable one to grasp the salient characteristics of a composer's style, but only in performance can the absolute merit of the music be definitely judged. Dr. Sawyer is evidently an accomplished musician, and one who has made himself familiar with the works composer by August Reissmann (acknowledging that his of the best modern composers. There is no harking back complete catalogue of Schumann's works in chronological to the manner and phraseology of a past age, but rather a disposition to avail himself of the freedom of utterance, which, without degenerating into license, is the chief feature in the works of the most gifted of contemporary composers. It is more in the chromatic nature of the progressions and in abrupt changes of tonality than in the construction of the movements that the modern character of the Oratorio is prominently displayed. The use of polyphony is not excessive, nor does the composer disdain a full close or purposely avoid symmetry of outline in the solos and choruses. On paper some of the numbers appear too long for the amount of thematic material employed. but in many instances the skill and fancy of the composer are plainly apparent. Among the choruses, we may name the setting of "Hark, the herald angels sing," cleverly constructed double chorus in the scene of the wedding at Cana, as perhaps the most striking and original. The title rôle is written for a soprano voice, and demands a singer of the first rank to do it justice. Decidedly the most remarkable solo is that in the scene of the flight into Egypt, a scena of great length but of well sustained interest. There are only two other solo parts, the Angel (tenor) and the Narrator (contralto). We have no hesitation and the Narrator (contralto). We have no hesitation in recommending "St. Mary" to the notice of choral societies. It is a work in which loftiness of aim has resulted in no mean measure of achievement.

The Morning and Evening Service, together with the Office for the Holy Communion, in E flat.

The Morning and Evening Service, together with the Office for the Holy Communion, in E.

By G. M. Garrett, Mus. Doc. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Portions of these Services have been published at various times during the last twenty-four years, and their wide acceptance has, no doubt, induced the esteemed composer to complete each setting. Both of them now include the Te Deum, Benedictus, Jubilate, two settings of the Kyrie, Credo, Offertory Sentences, Benedictus qui venit, Agnus Dei, and Gloria in Excelsis. The Service in E flat has the Cantata and Deus Misereatur, while that in E has the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis. If we mistake not, it was at St. Andrew's, Wells Street, while Mr. Barnby was organist at that church, that Dr. Garrett's Services were first used. Since that time they have become widely popular, and choirmasters will, therefore, welcome the appearance of those portions previously wanting. The setting of the morning Canticles in the Service in E flat is entirely new, and is in the composer's best manner. A finer Te Deum is not to be found among modern church music. It may be said to grow out of one majestic figure, bearing some resemblance to the "Dresden Amen." Though essentially dignified and ecclesiastical in character, many of the harmonic progressions are modern in feeling, and experts may trace some affinity to the style of Wesley. It may be noted that Dr. Garrett sets the Ter Sanctus fortissimo instead of pianissimo. The latter method is fortissimo instead of pianissimo. fashionable just now, but its justification is open to question. If the Benedictus is less striking, it is because the words are less suggestive of musical treatment. Mention, however, should be made of a beautiful passage just before the Gloria. The melodious Benedictus qui venit and the subdued and devotional Agnus Dei in this Service are also new. In the Service in E the Jubilate and the whole of the Communion Office, with the exception of the Kyrie and Sanctus, appear for the first time. The setting of the rooth Psalm is exceptionally fine and original, and the rest is in every respect worthy of the composer. Garrett has apparently no predilection in favour of the old or the modern system of time measurement. Sometimes he uses the minim as the unit and sometimes the crotchet. In conclusion, let it be said with emphasis that his Services deserve something more than ephemeral popularity. They contain in rich abundance every quality calculated to please the musician and the ecclesiastic.

Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in C. By T. Tallis Trimnell.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THIS Service was composed for the twelfth Annual Festival of the London Church Choir Association, held at St. Paul's Cathedral, in November last. Having regard to the requirements of the case, the studied simplicity observed by the composer is a point worthy of commendation, as a large body of executants unaccustomed to work together could not be expected to interpret an elaborate composition with unity and precision. Mr. Trimnell's setting of the evening canticles is essentially diatonic and straightforward. Though modern harmonic progressions are not wholly ignored they are employed in such a way as to give the least amount of difficulty. There is an effective fughetta in the first "Gloria," but with this exception, the counterpoint is, for the most part, note against note. As an example of solid dignified church music the Service is worthy of favourable notice.

This is a very readable and, in a measure, instructive little volume, written by one who professes himself to be neither an absolute adherent nor an unqualified opponent to the Bayreuth reformer-a somewhat bold position to assume on the part of a critical writer of Herr Kulke's reputation, but at the same time one which, we apprehend, will be shared by numerous admirers of the poet-composer in this country, who "draw the line" of their admiration "somewhere." Herr Kulke draws his line at the theoretical and philosophical Wagner, admitting the whole of his music, as a manifestation of incontestable genius (who may choose whatever "method" he thinks most appropriate for his purpose). While discarding, or at least questioning, the principles upon which this music has been applied to the drama, we do not feel called upon, or indeed competent, to pronounce upon the opinions expressed by the author concerning the errors of the "fundamental motive" of the "Nibelungen Ring," which occupy no inconsiderable portion of his book. Enough, however, remains to render Herr Kulke's essay an attractive study to the moderate admirers of Wagner who, we may say, abound in this country, and to whom it may serve as a fairly impartial guide through the poet-composer's artistic strivings. There can be no doubt that the Wagner controversy, although considerably (yet not entirely) shorn of its former invective and irrelevant acrimony since the master mind who had given rise to it has passed away, still continues to flourish. May it endure for some long time yet; for it involves art principles which are not to be solved in a day, and which, even if they should prove to be fallacious in their ultimate bearings, cannot fail to leave very tangible results behind them in the matter of the progress of the art itself. in this sense that we recommend the perusal of Herr Kulke's volume to our readers as a thoughtful contribution to the literature in question.

Why are there so few good Amateur Vocalists? Hints to Students of Singing. Advice to Parents on Elementary Musical Education. By B. Lützen. [E. Donajowski.]

In a small compass the author of this Treatise offers many excellent suggestions for the consideration of those who are desirous of cultivating vocal music as an accomplishment. "The best advice," he says, "I can give to amateurs is to abstain from singing as long as they are not able to afford real pleasure to the audience"; but then, as such unformed vocalists are usually too conceited to discover this truth for themselves, and it is not likely that their friends will enlighten them on the matter, reform can only come from the constant discussion of the subject outside the circle which it immediately concerns. The facts in the little book before us are just such as should be placed before young pupils; and as the remedies hinted at by the author are strengthened by cases within his own experience, we have hopes that amateurs will be induced to disregard for a time the flattering criticisms of their acquaintances, and listen to the teachings of a missionary from the real world of art.

The Musical Directory, Annual, and Almanack for 1885.
[Rudall, Carte and Co.]

This, the thirty-third issue of a Directory which led the way for many others, has all the salient features of its predecessors; and, indeed, as a record of facts, appears somewhat more carefully collated than usual. The article on the events of the past year is signed Herbert Bennett.

FOREIGN NOTES.

WEBER's early opera "Silvana" was revived, on the 5th ult., at the Hamburg Stadt-Theater. As already indicated by us, this charming work of the composer of "Freischütz" was last produced, in its original form, at the Kroll'sche Theater of Berlin in 1858, and for the purpose of the present revival has been supplied with a new libretto by Herr Pasqué, and additions to the score from other works of the composer by Herr F. Langer, of Mannheim, with a view of rendering it more suitable to modern operatic requirements. With these altered conditions, and the careful mounting bestowed upon it by Herr Pollini, the Hamburg performance of "Silvana" proved a decided success, and the energetic impresario of the Stadt-Theater has once more set an example to his German colleagues which will, no doubt, be imitated. How much of the highly favourable reception accorded to the work in its present shape may be owing to the skill of the adapters we are unable to say. The mere fact of its revival, however, furnishes additional proof of the growing tendency prevailing among German musicians towards a fuller appreciation of even the minor lyrical stage works of one of the most truly national operatic composers of the Fatherland.

Herr Heinrich Hofmann, the gifted German composer, is about to complete a new opera, entitled "Donna Diana." As a member of the Royal Academy of Arts of Berlin, Herr Hofmann has been commissioned to write a festive cantata for the forthcoming anniversary of the Emperor's birthday, to be performed at the State institution in

On the 13th inst., the anniversary of the death of Richard Wagner, the Berlin Wagner Society will hold a solemn séance, in the course of which "Das Liebesmahl der and important extracts from "Parsifal," will be d. Artists and choral societies, both of the Apostel,' performed. capital and other parts of Germany, will take part in the performances.

A new symphonic poem, by Herr Anton Rubinstein, entitled " Eroica," will shortly be produced at the Leipzig Gewandhaus.

A very salutary regulation has recently been introduced at the Leipzig Stadt-Theater, according to which late comers at the performances will not be able to gain admittance to their seats except during the interval between the acts. The annoyance caused by tardy arrivals seems to be of as frequent occurrence in German as it undoubtedly is in London theatres. According to the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, a "society" has been constituted amongst the theatre goers at Bremen, the members whereof "pledge themselves to allow no one to have access to their seats after the performance has commenced, except during the intervals." We fully sympathise with the aim's of this We fully sympathise with the aim's of this somewhat novel combination of theatrical habitues, and only trust that in the effort of attaining them they may not provoke disturbances more serious than those intended to be suppressed.

A music festival extending over three days is to be held in June next at Bonn, on which occasion the production of a new choral and orchestral work by Herr Max Bruch, entitled "Achilles," will be the principal novelty. Herr Victor Nessler's latest opera, "Der Trompeter von Säkkingen," was performed for the first time at the Berlin Royal Opera on the 10th ult., with a moderate success. Every effort appears to have been made on the part of the régime to render the occasion a brilliant one; but the work does not seem to appeal to the taste of the more cultivated portion of the composer's own countrymen.

Ferdinand David's famous violin, one of the finest specimens of Joseph Guarneri del Jesu, has lately been acquired by Professor Florian Zajic, of Strassburg, of his friend and colleague in art, Herr Wilhelmj, at the price originally paid for this notable instrument by the latter—viz., M17,000

At the Paris Cpéra a new humorous operatic work, the performance of which had been looked forward to with considerable interest for some time, was brought out on the 12th ult. under the title of "Tabarin." The libretto, from the pen of M. Ferrier, is concerned chiefly with the Tabarin, a historical figure of the time of Louis XIII., and of his conjugal experiences with his somewhat wayward and equally historical wife, Dame Francisquine.

M. Emile Pessard, composer of "Le Char" and "Le Capitaine Fracasse," has written the music. "The composer," says a correspondent of the Daily Telegraph, "writes well for the voices, and proves throughout his work that he is a practised and accomplished musician; but he has been much cramped in his subject, which, I venture to think, is far better suited to a comparatively small theatre, like the Opéra Comique, than to the enormous salle of the Opéra. . . . The most salient features of the first act consist of a love-duet for Francisquine and Gauthier (her lover), a lively terzetto for soprano, second tenor, and bass, and a sort of drinking song for Tabarin. A quartet and tenor love-song are also worthy of notice, while the phrase for the chorus in the finale is full of beauty. M. Pessard is, indeed, happiest in the close of each of his acts. The entr'acte was much applauded, and the bustle of the scene preparatory to the opening of the stage performance was well kept up. The Chœur des Bouquetières, 'Qui vent des Roses,' is particularly graceful, and the themes of the dance-music are quaint and original, while in the finale the repentance of the erring wife is expressed in accents of melodic passion of a loftier character than anything to be found in the earlier portions of the work. All the artists are worthy of praise, M. Melchisedec, who impersonates Tabarin, exerting himself with specially good effect in the difficult scena at the end of the opera. M. Dereims is an agreeable and good-looking tenor, and the minor parts are sufficiently well filled. The scenery is excellent, as usual, the Place Dauphine, with the famous statue of Henri Quatre, which is still to this day to be seen on the bridge, being a most picturesque view. The ballet is noticeable for a sort of 'Madame Angot' quarrel, danced by two women instead of sung." The Paris press is all but unanimous in its praise of the new work by MM. Ferrier and Emile Pessard.

M. Eugene d'Albert, the gifted young pianist, is just now in Paris, where he will give a series of recitals, and likewise take part in the Châtelet Concerts of the 1st and 8th inst.

The Rossini Prize of the Paris Academy of Fine Arts has been awarded to M. Emile Moreau for a lyrical scene, entitled " Les Jardins d'Armide."

Herr Adalbert Goldschmidt's Oratorio, "The Seven Cardinal Sins," is to be performed at one of M. Lamoureux's Concerts at the Château d'Eau. The German text has been translated by M. Victor Wilder.

A successful revival of Weber's "Oberon" has recently taken place at the Theatre de la Monnaie, of Brussels, where that noble work had not been produced for many years past. It is likely to remain on the répertoire of the Brussels opera for some time.

In anticipation of the forthcoming bi-centenaries of the birth of Handel and Johann Sebastian Bach, a festival performance was announced to take place to-day at the Brussels Conservatoire, under the direction of the Principal of that institution, M. Gevaert. The following is the interesting programme-viz.: Dettingen Te Deum (Handel), Cantata "Gottes Zeit" (Bach), solo pieces for the clavecin (Handel), Orchestral Suite in C (Bach), Fragment of an Organ Concerto (Handel), Symphony for Organ (Bach), vocal pieces from "Jephtha" and "Joshua" (Handel). M. Mailly, a professor of the institution, will preside at the organ, and Mdlle. Geruma will perform the clavecin pieces on an ancient instrument of that description. Mr. Maas, it is stated in the Observer, will be the only foreign artist engaged to take part in this festival.

A most successful Concert was recently given, under aristocratic patronage, at Liège, the numbers of the programme consisting entirely of music by modern Russian composers, among them those of MM. Barodin, Cesar Cui, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Anadole Liadoff, Balakiroff, and others, as yet, less known outside their native country. Russian musicians, on the other hand, appear to desire a more intimate acquaintance with the national music of other countries. Herr Johann Svendsen, the Norwegian composer, is about to proceed to St. Petersburg, at the invitation of the Imperial Music Society in that capital, for delineation of the amusing personality of a strolling actor, the purpose of conducting a Concert of that institution, on which occasion the production of Scandinavian music will be de rigueur. The example thus set by musical associations in Belgium and Russia might, with advantage to the art, be imitated by musical entrepreneurs of other countries.

The Budget-Commission of the town of Liège, in Belgium, has decided to levy a tax upon pianofortes, as forming part of the category described as "articles de luxe." In consequence of this decree, investigations have been set on foot in order to ascertain the number of instruments at present in existence in the 16,000 houses of which the town can boast. We apprehend, however, that long before the proposed tax will be actually levied, the enlightened Government of Belgium will, in the interests of the art, have suggested to its town of Liège some other means of relieving its present apparently pressing neces-

The first performance (announced by us in a previous number) of Rubinstein's opera, "Nero," at Antwerp, on December 30 last, has not been very successful, although the work has gained somewhat in public favour, after having undergone considerable curtailments, during one or two recent repetitions. The composer was present at the Antwerp première of his work, but did not conduct it.

A brilliant young tenor has been "discovered" by Herr Jahn, the director of the Vienna Hof-Theater, in the person of Herr Dubois, a civil engineer at Frankfurt. Having already received some vocal training, the fortunate possessor of so valuable a gift has been invited to a trial before the critical audience of the Vienna Hof-Theater, which, if successful, will immediately lead to his engagement at the Imperial establishment.

The recent performances at the Vienna Hof-Oper of the whole of Wagner's music-dramas (with the exception of "Parsifal") have brought in the sum of 30,000 florins (£2,500); a sufficient proof of the growing popularity of the Bayreuth reformer's works.

Molle. Van Zandt is just now the much fêted prima donna of the Imperial Opera at St. Petersburg.

At Kiel (Holstein) a Festival commemorative of the joint bi-centenary of Bach and Handel is to be held next month, under the direction of Professor Joachim, with the co-operation of the Schleswig-Holstein Festival Choir. A Cantata by Bach, Handel's "Joshua," and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony are to be the leading features in the performance.

The first performance at the Apollo Theatre, at Rome, of Leo Delibes' Opera "Lakmé," together with the same composer's Ballet "Coppelia," has not found favour with the audience, who frequently expressed their disapproval during the evening.

Wagner's "Lohengrin" was recently performed with extraordinary success at the Apollo Theatre of Rome, the part of Elsa being sung by Madame Kupfer-Berger, of the Vienna Hof-Theater, and that of the Knight of the Swan by Signor Stagno.

We hear from Turin that Signor Puccio's new Opera. "Le Wili," with which the present season at the Regio Theatre opened, has scarcely justified the anticipations of amateurs, though the work of the young maestro is considered a most musicianlike production. At the same theatre, Wagner's "Lohengrin" is shortly to be produced, with Signor Stagno in the title rôle.

The Stefano Tempia Choral Society of Turin gave a Concert, on the 18th ult., devoted to living Italian composers, the following being some of the principal items in the programme: Madrigal, for four voices (Edoardo Perelli), Kyrie and Qui tollis from Mass in E minor (Giulio Roberti), Fifty-sixth Psalm, for three voices and soli (Antonio Bazzini); Fantasmi nell' ombra, cantata (Ciro Pinsuti); Ave Regina, chorus (E. Perelli); choral pieces, "Twilight," and " Peace " (Giulio Roberti).

The first number of a new quarterly musical periodical, entitled Vicrteljahr's Schrift für Musik-Wissenschaft, has just been issued by the firm of Breitkopf and Härtel, of The names of the editors, Herren Friedrich Chrysander and Philipp Spitta, are a sufficient guarantee for the attractiveness and solidity of its contents.

The Berlin Allgemeine Deutsche Musik-Zeitung, a journal frequently quoted by us, appears since the new year under the altered title of Allgemeine Musik-Zeitung.

We have received the first number of the present year (the eighth of its existence) of the Centralblatt Deutscher Zither-Vereine, a journal devoted to the development of Zither-playing, edited by Herr R. Wächtler, of Hamburg. Herr Emerich Kastner, of Vienna, has resigned the editorship of the recently started music-journal "Parsifal," and is preparing the issue, on his own account, of a new periodical devoted to the interests of Wagnerian art.

Ignaz Ungar, the well-known director of an academy for pianoforte-playing at Vienna, died there on the 4th ult. At Davos, in Switzerland, died on the 4th ult., at the early age of thirty, Josef Kotek, a professor of the Berlin Hochschule für Musik; an earnest artist, and one of the most promising among the younger generation of violin

The death is announced at Gran (Hungary) of Carl Seyler, musical director at the cathedral of that town. Seyler, born at Ofen in 1815, was a pupil of the celebrated Ritter von Seyfried, and has produced an almost incredible number of compositions for the church, besides numerous string-quartets, overtures, and songs, all of them smoothly written somewhat in the style of Spohr, but not devoid of a distinctive merit of their own.

We have also to announce the death, on the 23rd ult., at Paris, of Félix Clément, at the age of sixty-three. The deceased, who was both a composer and musical litterateur, has done most service to the art in his latter capacity, more especially in the production of his valuable "Histoire de la musique religieuse." On the other hand, his "Dictionnaire Lyrique" and "Les Musiciens Celèbres," though furnishing most interesting material, can scarcely be considered reliable guides in the field of literature to which they pertain. Clément, besides being the author of some theoretical works on music, has composed some choruses to Racine's "Athalie," and a comic opera, which, however, has never been performed.

CORRESPONDENCE.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,-Mr. Corder's account of his recent strange interview will, of course, have been perused by different readers with different feelings. With musicians, however, I am certain that the smiles at first called up thereby will speedily have faded away before a feeling of indignation at the thought of the most heavenly of Arts being thus dragged in the mire. My object in writing this is to throw a little light upon the remarks with which the writer supplements his narrative. Mr. Corder himself is, doubtless, perfectly aware of the truth of what I am about to say; but, as a wrong inference may be drawn from his half sportive words, it will not be amiss to clear up the matter. If we are to found an English School it will not be by the invention of English local colour. The invention of local colour is an absurdity and an impossibility. rhythmic, melodic, and harmonic peculiarities which constitute what is called "local colour" have had their origin in primitive times, generally from the imperfections of primitive instruments, and to manufacture any such now would be like building modern ruins. Not but what, considering the essential unity of the British Empire, and the mixed nature of the English race, we might fairly lay claim to the honour of those Welsh, Scotch, and Irish musical characteristics which (at any rate the Scotch) have always been identified by the foreigner with "English music." It is enough that Caledonia should send forth her sons armed with the terrors of the bagpipe, without our wishing for the same sort of thing as an indigenous growth! Our old English ballads and dances I have not taken into account, as they may be considered neither old enough nor national enough.

But, supposing that England had some eccentric rhythm, distorted scale or cacophonous pedal chord peculiarly her own, an indispensable step in the growth of an English School of music would be its emancipation from such national mannerisms. In the higher regions of musical Art "there is neither Jew nor Greek," cosmopolitanism reigns there. Germany, the birthplace of our models, has no national style, though she has so many individual ones. of the Inhabitants, Cost and Charges £342 16s. 7d., open'd the 8th May, 1748." styles of Mozart and Beethoven, Mendelssohn and Schumann, as between the national music of any two nations under the sun. This personal distinctiveness, which is original, is a universal property of genius, whereas a national distinctiveness, which is imitative, has always been avoided by the greatest masters of the Art. Germany has her folk-songs and dance-tunes, but what traces of their influence can be found in Mozart's Masses, Beethoven's Symphonies, Mendelssohn's Oratorios, Schumann's piano-forte works? When Mozart writes a "Ländler Waltz," Beethoven introduces a scrap of Austrian melody, and Mendelssohn gives us an imitation of the "Volkslied," the exception only makes the rule more clearly apparent. France has had no materials for a national style. Italy has a national style without materials, for the simple reason that she has had one composer whom all her others have copied. Lastly, we come to the great Sclavonic race, now pushing to the front in Art as in politics. And what do we see here? We certainly see a crowd of minor composers who are nothing if not national; but we also see the recognised musical leader of the race, Dvorák, great as is his love for the native strains of his people, nevertheless, as he enters Art's Holy of Holies, putting off from his feet the fantastically embroidered shoes of national mannerism, and devoting himself to his sacred subject with no other thought than that of doing honour to its innermost mean-Let us do likewise, and genius, when it shall come, will do the rest. H. ADAMS.

17, Birchington Road, Kilburn, N.W.

. [While heartily endorsing the above remarks, I fail to perceive how they are called forth by my piece of banter, the point of which Mr. Adams seems completely to have missed. It is so humiliating to have to explain one's poor little joke that I prefer to remain misunderstood. But at least I must deny the charge of "dragging the most heavenly of Arts in the mire." My article had no concern whatever with High Art, but only with Low Art, that melancholy and widespread phase of English music which most musicians are content to ignore, but which is a great fact and one which I take upon myself to hold up to scorn and ridicule on every possible occasion. HANDEL MYTHS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,-Your article in THE MUSICAL TIMES of last month under the above heading, referring to the "Cannons" organ now in Trinity Church, Gosport, was most interesting to all who value such a relic of Handel, and I am sure the following authentic information will be read with pleasure by those of the profession who have always associated this organ with the tradition that as the Oratorio of "Esther" was composed at Cannons for the Duke of Chandos in 1720 (and this instrument was then in the Duke's private chapel), it was the organ on which it was composed or first performed.

The following extracts are taken from the Vestry Book of records of Trinity Church, Gosport, referring to the purchase of the organ in 1747.

Dr. the subscribers to the organ to Chas. Woodmason:-

Also the following as to the Election of an Organist:—
"Gosport, 13th July, 1747.—The conditions are (that if any dispute shall arise about appointing an Organist, or doing anything relating to the Organ) that every person that subscribed one guinea shall have a single Vote, and any person subscribing more shall have as many Votes as he or she subscribed guineas, and everything to be transacted by ye majority of the Votes of the subscribers.

"In execution of the agreement above prefix'd, the subscribers met in the Chapell in order to make a choice of an Organist, the Candidates were Mr. James Peuceable, Organist, of Southampton, and Mr. Moses Hawker, of Portsmouth, when, upon casting up the Poll, there appear'd for Mr. Peuceable 141 votes, and for Mr. Hawker 28, whereupon the former was declar'd duly Elected.'

When the late Dr. Rimbault was on a visit to this town, in 1875, he saw the organ, and was allowed the use of the Vestry Book referred to. He was at that time writing an article for the "Leisure Hour," "By Paths of Music," and in it referred to this organ, stating a subscription was then being made to rebuild the swell; this was completed the following year at a cost of £200.

In 1859 I lent the printed document of 1748, referred to in your article, to Dr. E. J. Hopkins, of the Temple, for perusal, who was much pleased to find out the true whereabouts of the "Cannons" Organ, as up to this period, in his first edition of "The Organ, its History and Construction," he supposed it was in Spa Field Chapel. I believe this is the only Dr. and Cr. account now in existence, and was published at the time for the use of the subscribers.

The original entries in the Vestry Book I shall be pleased to show anyone who may be in this neighbourhood, but the letters of Mr. Ch. Cock I regret I have not been able to find, the vestry clerk, in whose custody the books, &c., are kept, not being willing to undertake a search amongst such a multiplicity of documents, dating from

I hope, however, some day to find them.

The Great and Choir Organ is almost in the same state as when purchased, but unfortunately the beautifully carved case, which is of dark oak, has been disfigured (from what reason I have been unable to ascertain) with oak painting. This I propose to have carefully removed as soon as funds are available for a thorough restoration, which is much needed. I shall be glad if the musical public would kindly assist me in carrying out the work, and enable me to restore this most interesting organ and perpetuate the name of our greatest composer of oratorios, who was so intimately associated with it. Any subscriptions, to myself or the Rev. O. S. Walford, Vicar, for such a laudable object will be thankfully received, and I earnestly appeal to the musical community, as funds are not available in our poor parish for so large an undertaking, which will cost £400.

I am, Sir, your obedient Servant, JOHN HOWLETT,

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,-I cordially endorse the remarks made by your correspondents bearing on the Cathedral question with relation to the Musical Services, and the remuneration of the minor officials. That the Cathedral Commissioners, from whom so much was expected, have ignored every suggestion made to them, whether by Precentors, Organists, or Lay Clerks, is true enough; indeed, the recommendations seem to be based upon some preconceived notions of their own, rather than upon evidence bearing on the facts. The Capitular side of the question, the very weakest point in the whole system, and one which stands most in need of reform, they have altogether evaded; indeed, the minor officials are completely disestablished, and the whole position conceded to the Capitular bodies. There is also this peculiarity in the recommendations, that they are void of any general guiding principle, the whims of this or that Dean and Chapter meeting us at every turn. For, indeed, Chapell, at Cannons, near London, by the subscriptions the salary by Statute in no case is defined, but at Durham, year for life is secured to the Lay Clerks, and at Ely the pension is fixed at one third of the salary whatever that may be. In other places both the salary and pension are made to depend entirely on the will of the Dean and Chapter for the time being. Now, if the principle of defining the pension at Durham is right, upon what grounds is it ignored in other places? The point which it appears to me ought to be insisted upon by the minor officials at the present time is, that both salary and pension, whether of Minor Canon, Organist, or Lay Clerk, should be defined and enforced by Statute and not left to the caprices of the Deans and Canons. The Commissioners tell us in their second report, that they, in conjunction with the Capitular bodies, have drawn up a scheme to give effect to the Clause 13 and 14 Vict., cap. III., s. 18., which was passed in 1866, and which was intended out of the funds in the hands of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners to secure adequate stipends to all the minor officials. Now, I am one of those who not only took a part in the agitation which resulted in the passing of the clause, but I also drew the attention of the Cathedral Commissioners to its existence. What the motive of the scheme under consideration is, I know not, but I suspect it is a proposal to hand more money over to the Deans and Chapters to disburse as they think fit; if so, the position will be no better than at present, for after it has been squandered on one object or another, to gratify the Capitular mind, the old and well known cry of agricultural depression will be heard once more, and reductions of salaries will be made again with most alarming alacrity. We must judge of the future by the past, and as we have the opportunity, care must be taken that no legislation on this subject shall take place until the just claims of the working portion of the Cathedral Staff have been recognised by Statute. Now I suggest that the Statutes Bill, to be introduced next Session, the object of which is to create machinery which will have the power of altering or making new statutes, should be strenuously opposed; and after this, those statutes must be laid before Parliament. It is at this point that I should counsel opposition in the form of a memorial to the house of Commons, which memorial should be signed by Minor Canons, Organists, and Lay Clerks of all the Cathedrals. Meantime, I should advise all who are interested in the matter to be constantly on the alert, and to watch the progress of the question, so that we may be ready to speak with effect when the time comes.

I am, Sir, yours very truly,
LAY CLERK.

THE CONCLUDING VOLUNTARY.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—The objectors to the out-going voluntary have spoken three hundred years too late. As soon as the organ assumed adequate dimensions it was brought into use as a solo instrument; and now that it has become all but universal, with a thousand differences in other things, all sects and parties have adopted the loud concluding voluntary as a seemly cover over the noise of a dispersing congregation. It is understood that while in the accompaniment of the service, however great the resources of his instrument, the organist is restrained to the exact tone-colouring required, he has full discretion to display its powers in the concluding voluntary. My friend, Mr. Walter Parratt, thinks that this impairs the effect of the sermon. Such an objection from such a source may have weight with those religious bodies with whom the sermon has the first consideration. I desire to consider it from a churchman's point of view.

It is not the highest privilege of Christian worship to leave the House of God impressed with a sermon. A study of the formation and structure of the Liturgy will show that our worship is not designed so much to be impressive as expressive—expressive of Christian thankfulness and praise. The Order for Morning and Evening Prayer and of Holy Communion commence with expressions of penitence soon brightens into praise, the later parts of the service being still more joyous, and in the highest act of Christian worship rising at the close to the noblest burst of thanksgiving. The after 15 years' service, a pension of not less than £50 a year for life is secured to the Lay Clerks, and at Ely the pension is fixed at one third of the salary whatever that preface the service with a voluntary of quiet solemn may be. In other places both the salary and pension are made to depend entirely on the will of the Dean and Chapter for the time being. Now, if the principle of defining as the service of which it forms the conclusion.

The organist who desires to be artistically true to the liturgy will endeavour within these lines to mark the varying voices of the Church's year. And there may be times when the sermon itself may suggest the voluntary. (blind) organist of Selby Abbey, who had at his fingers' ends Mr. Best's arrangements from the Great Masters, had such wonderful facility in so choosing as to give not unfrequently, to those who know the piece, another touch to the lessons of the preacher, and a good voluntary at the same time. Only a month ago, when I had been preaching on the fortifying power of religious peace, in a church with a good organ, the concluding voluntary was impromptu, on the subject of Sir George Elvey's tenor song, "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace," handled in such a musicianly manner that I stayed to hear it out and to thank the organist. Players are not always in the mood for extemporising, and some disdain to play arrangements: but a true artist will never be inappropriate to the occasion by any untimely burst of noise or irreverent entry of a fugue immediately after the benediction. No doubt tasteless, thoughtless, players exist, who well deserve the reproach which has given rise to this discussion, but as there is, perhaps, no fault more easy to cure, it would be a policy of extreme clumsiness to abolish the concluding voluntary altogether. For my own part, looking back on six and twenty years' experience as a clergyman, with a variety of organists, I have found the concluding voluntary a help, and am inclined to think that the old Monkish superstition about church bells is true, when applied to the tones of a good and well-played church organ-they help to keep away the devil of secular thoughts-at least, much better than an "impressive silence" does.

I am, Sir, yours truly,

THE LATE DR. LLEWELLYN THOMAS. TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES,"

To the Editors of "The MOSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—It is proposed to endeavour to perpetuate the existing Gold Medal at the Royal Academy of Music, bearing the name of the late lamented Dr. Llewellyn Thomas, and as one of the many members of the musical profession who have derived incalculable and lasting benefit from the kind and ever ready advice, and great experience of that skilful and genial gentleman, I confidently ask you to allow space in your columns for this appeal to his former patients and friends in the musical and dramatic professions, trusting they will come forward and assist in raising a fund sufficient to attain so desirable an object. The following gentlemen have kindly consented to act as a Committee: Sir G. A. Macfarren, Walter Macfarren, Esq., Frank R. Cox, Esq., A. D. Duvivier, Esq. Subscriptions sent to Sir Samuel Scott and Co., I, Cavendish Square, or to John Gill, Esq., Royal Academy of Music, will be duly acknowledged.—Yours faithfully,

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

ABREDARE.—Handel's Oratorio Samson was performed, on December 25, before a large and enthusiastic audience, by the members of the Choral Union. The principal vocalists were Mesdames Worrall and Spenser Jones, Eos Morlais, Mr. Tom Williams, and Mr. Lucas Williams, all of whom were highly efficient. The choruses were excellently rendered, and the Cyfarthfa atring band gave valuable assistance. Miss Meta Scott, R.A.M., presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. W. J. Evans at the harmonium. Mr. Rhys Evans conducted.

Mr. W. I. Evans at the narmonium. Mr. Knyš Evans conducted.

BASINGSTOKE.—The members of the Harmonic Society gave a performance of Cowen's Rose Maiden, on the 6th ult., at the Town Hall.
The solos were ably taken by Miss Ada Patterson, Miss C. Wright,
Mr. Sydney Tower, and Mr. David White, and the choruses were well rendered. The second part of the Concert was miscellaneous, including a song: "The Lily," by the Conductor, Mr. W. H. Liddle, well sung by Miss Wright. A Ballade by Moszkowski for piano, and violin was played by Miss K. Liddle and Mr. J. S. Liddle, Mus. Bac. Mr. Hubert Hunt presided at the American organ, and Miss Liddle at the pianoforte.

Hunt presided at the American organ, and Miss Liddle at the pianoforte.

BELFAST.—The performance of Gounod's Redemption by the Philharmonic Society, on December 19, was an unqualified success, and reflected the highest credit upon the indefatigable Conductor of the Society, Herr Adolf Beyschlag. Those who heard this fine work for the first time on this occasion could not but have been surprised at the character of the music, and at the method employed by M. Gounod in working out his sublime theme. It might have been expected that operfect a master of dramatic effect would place no restraint upon himself in treating the various striking episodes in the life of the Redeemer. M. Gounod has, however, sought to accomplish something far higher and nobler than can be produced by the illustration of a succession of dramatic incidents. His music is not superficial, it is not impressionable, it is rarely emotional, but it never cases to be devotional. The chastened beauty of the orchestration is in keeping with the earliest traditions of the Church; it possesses no more ornament than a devotional work of the school of Palestrina, and its art is too subtle to be appreciated as it deserves by those who are not students. The asolos were excellently given by Madame De Fonblanque, Mr. H. Beaumont (who, however, has scarcely a voice of sufficient Cousin Mantell, and Mr. J. H. Neill. The choruses were finely rendered throughout, the grand choral piece, "Unfold, ve portais," producing an overpowering sensation. Great praise must also be awarded to the orchestra, the brass instruments—used by the composer with such exquisite effect—being exceptionally good. On the whole the Concert, although testing the powers of the executants to the utmost, was one of the best ever given by the Society.

of the best ever given by the Society.

BELPER—The Harmonic Society gave its first Concert on the 1st all, when part of The Messiah was performed, under the conductors, when part of The Messiah was performed, under the conductors, when part of The Messiah was performed under the Step, and Mr. Kenningh and the Step, and Mr. Kenningh and the Step, and Mr. Kenningh and the Concert highly successful.—Handel's Judas Maccabaus was performed by the Musical Society, in the Public Hall, on the 20th ult., to a crowded audience. Miss F. Bristowe, R.A.M., Miss Hadfield, Mr. Parkin, and Mr. E. Jackson were the principal vocaitists. Mr. W. S. Woodward, Derby, led the band, and Mr. A. Mellor presided at the organ, each with his accustomed ability. Mr. T. B. Mellor, Organist of Bakewell Parish Church, conducted, much of the success being due to his untiring energy and skill. At the next Concert of the Society Bennett's May Queen and a miscellaneous selection will be given.

Bognors.—The Bognor and Felpham Choral Union gave a Concert on the 18th ult, when Birch's Robin Hood was performed in a most praiseworthy manner. Miss Bertha Moore, R.A.M., Mr. C. E. Pillow, and Mr. Seymour Kelly, of Chichester Cathedral, were the principal worelists. Miss Marie Osmon accompanied and Mr. W. Grice

BOLTON .- On Christmas Eve the Albert Hall Town Hall was filled BOLTON.—On Christmas Eve the Albert Hall Town Hall was filled with an appreciative audience on the occasion of The Messiah being given by the local Philharmonic Society. Bender of Allan-The Choral Society, which has entered upon the second year of its existence, gave the first Concert of the season on December 19, in the Established Church, kindly granted for the occasion by the trustees. The work selected for performance was Henry Smart's Cantata, Jacob, the solos being excellently rendered by Mrs. Dick, Miss Alice Young, Mr. J. T. Murray, and Mr. A. Black. The choruses were given with much precision and effect, and Mr. Erskine and the members of the choir are to be congestuated upon the successful result of their labours. Mr. T.

Bublish Salterson.—An excellent Concert was given by the Budleigh and Salterton Musical Society, on December 30, at the Public Rooms. The principal vocalists were Miss Beata Francis and Signor Villa, both of whom elicited the warmest applause. Miss Francis in Tost's "Bid me good bye," creating a marked effect, Miss Lizzle Patch, R.C.M., was the solo pinnist, and Mr. Wylmicombe, Mr. Churchill Sibley, and Miss Brushfield, were most able vocalists were Miss Ada South (whose singing was greatly appreciated and who was encored in two of her songs), Mr. Rhodes and Mr. Charles Wilson. Both the gentlemen won enthusiastic encores. The band, under the direction of Mr. Tench White, gave much satisfaction in the various selections, the soloists being very successful.

CARLISE.—On Saturday evening, the solosise being very successful.

CARLISE.—On Saturday evening, the 24th ult, the fourth of the series of Saturday Evening Concerts for the People was given, in the Drill Hall, to a very large audience. Madame Shepherd's well-cultivated soprano voice showed to much advantage in her songs, "She wandered down the mountain side," "Beautiful Roses," and "Children's Home," all of which were rapturously encored, and Mr. Bims gave "Love sounds the alarm," and "The Arcthusa." The orchestra, under Mr. Binning's direction, rendered, in a praiseworthy manner, Bucalossis" w 'Hunting Scene, and other pieces, and Mr. H. Brook's harp solos were much admired. Mr. B. Scott, jun., was, as usual, accompanis.

CLIPTON.—The St. Andrew's Choral Society gave a Concert at the Memorial Hall, on Tuesday, the 13th ult. The programme comprised Macfaren's May Day and a miscellaneous selection. Miss Ellicott was the principal vocalist, and Mr. W. Haydn Cox, Organist of the Parish Church, conducted.

Parish Church, conducted.

DarLinGron.—A Concert was given in North Road Chapel by the choir, assisted by friends, under the leadership of the Organist, Mr. J. W. Lockey, on Christmas Day. The first part of the programme consisted of a Cantata entitled fesse of Nasarch*, arranged by Hopkins; and the second part was miscellaneous, including the anthems, "Praise the Lord" (Scott), and "I will give thanks" (Barnby). Solos were contributed by Miss Schadwick, Miss Fectham, and Mr. R. T. Wilson. Mr. Charles Stephenson (Organist of St. John's Church), presided at the organ, and also gave a Recital. The Concert was a thorough success.

Daverneys.—The Choral Society gave its first Concert for the season on the 16th ult., under the conductorship of Mr C. W. Herbert. The first part consisted of Sir A. Sullivan's Oratorio, The Prodigal Son, the soloists being Miss Taylor, Mrs. Cox, Mr. Toomer, and Mr. T. Kempton, all of whom were highly successful. Mr. T. Kempton's declamation of the recitative and air "Bring forth the best robe," won for him well-merited applause. The second part was miscellaneous.

for him well-merited applause. The second part was miscellaneous. FARSLEY.—On Friday and Saturday evenings, the 16th and 17th ult., a Conversazione took place at the Rehoboth School, and was a decided success. Friday evening's programme consisted of recitals from the works of Shakespeare and other eminent authors, ably given by Mr. J. H. Ellaby, B.A., the vocal selections being wholly sustained by Miss Lister, whose rendering of Sullivan's "Let me dream again" was highly appreciated. Mr. Arthur Pearson accompanied and played Weber's "Invitation à la Valse" with much skill. Saturday evening's programme was equally well received, the vocalists, Miss Clarke, Miss Marshall, Mr. Rhodes, and Mr. Hainsvorth, singing their pieces and the programme offects. Mr. Pearson again accompanied and contributed misnoffer lander. pianoforte solos.

FINCHLEY.—A performance of the Messiah, somewhat curtailed, took place at Christ Church, on December 23, after a short service. The principal vocalists were Mrs. Dye, Miss May Cartwright, Messiah (Selficient), and Griffin, all of whom were thoroughly efficient. The choruses, although many members of the choir were absent from indisposition, were given with excellent precision and effect; much of the general success being due to the admirable conducting of Mr. Alfred Dye, and the skilful accompaniment of Mr. Decker or the control of Mr. Docker on the organ.

GEORGETOWN, DEMERARA.—The third Concert of the Musical Society took place on December 23. The programme was miscellaneous, and comprised selections from Gade's Et' King's Daughter and Sullivan's Princess Ida, part-songs by Pinsuti, Hatton, Bishop, &c., and songs by Mrs. Pitman, Miss Thompson, Mr. Brown, and Mr. Morris. The band was under the direction of the Conductor of the Society, Mr. W. R. Colbeck, and Mr. Nusum was accompanist.

The rendering of Gounda's "Bethlehem," with orchestral accompaniments, was especially successful, and Mr. Carmichael's singing of the same composer's "Nazareth" was highly appreciated. An orchestra of thirty performers, under Mr. S. Rowlandson, performed the Overture to Zauberföles, the Pastoral Symphony (Messiah), &c. There was a large audience.

Porlock, Somerser,—The Messiah was given in the Parish Church, on Sunday, the 11th ult,, at evening service. There was an efficient orchestra of twenty-five performers, comprised parily of professionals, parily of mateurs, all soft, we then tittle foreign lely; and as seen were sung by the Misses Dudeney, Mr. T. Taylor, and a member of the choir. Before the service, Mendelssohu's "I waited for the Lord" was sung. The performance of The Messiah was excellent in every respect. The church was crowded with an appreciative congregation. After the short sermon by the Rev. W. Hook (who also conducted), a hymn, accompanied by organ and orchestra, was sung. Mr. Warriner presided at the organ.

READING.—The choir of St. Mary's performed a well selected programme of Christmas Carols and selections from the Msssiah in the Church on Monday evening, December 29, before a large number of earnest listeners. Mr. W. H. Strickland, the Organist, performed with much effect several pieces on the fine organ.

ROCHDALE.—The second of a series of Subscription Concerts was KOCHDALE.—The second of a series of Subscription Concerts was given, on the 14th ult., before a large audience. The organiser of these Concerts is Mr. S. Myerscough, Mus. Bac., who seems determined to foster a love for classical music in Rochdale. Mr. Carrodu (violin) and Madame Frost (harp) were highly successful in their solos, and Miss Hilda Wilson (a Manchester favourite). Miss Emily Marshall, Mr. Kendall Thompson, Mr. Barton, and Mr. Bereton, were the vocalists. An excellent performance of Handel's Large in G. arranged as a trio for harp, violin, and organ, was a feature in the ROCHESTER.—Two stops having been added to the organ at St. Nicholas's, a Recital, combined with a carefully selected programme supplied by local singers, was given to the subscribers on December 27, by the Organist, Mr. B. Willis, who played with great taste and expression. Vocal music was also contributed with much success by Miss. Cracknell, Miss Bass, Messrs. T. Oldroyd, T. C. Holliday and Ovenden.

SALFORD—On the Sunday before Christmas Day, after a short Evening Service, it has been the custom for several years, at Trinity Chuch, to have a "Carol Service," lasting about an hour. The ordinary choir was augmented this year to over 100 voices, and the Carola and other Christmas music were exceedingly well rendered, under the direction of Mr. W. H. Holloway, L. Mus. T.C.L., the Organist and Choirmaster of the Church. Among the selected music were the anthems, "It is high time" (Barnby), "Sing, O daughter of Zion "(Gadsby), and "Let us now go even unto Bethlehem" (Hopkins) the sacred song "Let joyful hymns to heaven sacred "(Gounod); and the Carols, "God rest you, merry geatlemen," "Good Christian men, rejoice," "Silent night," "Once in Royal David's city," and "O come, all ye faithful," Novello's arrangement for solo, duet, trio, quartet,

Supersonars.—The fifth Concert of the St. John's Choral Society was given on Tuesday, the 31th ult., under the conductorship of Mr. Arthur W. Marchant, Mus. Bac., Oxon., who was most ably assisted by the skilful accompaniment of Mr. Ernest Kiver, R.A.M., on the pianoforte, and Mr. A. Mackintosh, F.C.O., on the harmonium. The first part was devoted to Romberg's Lay of the Bell, in which the decided improvement of the choir was especially noticeable. The second part was miscellaneous—Miss Carrie Blackwell, Miss Ethel Harraden, Mr. Tilliard, and Mr. Maybrick contributing solos with much success. We are glad to find that the Society now numbers unwards of no voices.

much success. We are glad to find that the Society now numbers upwards of 100 voices.

Sheffield — The first performance of Gounoi's remarkable work The Redemption, under the auspices of Mr. William Brown, was given in the Albert Hall, on the robit ult, with a comprehensiveness and excellence which reflected the greatest credit upon all concerned in its presentation. The principal vocalists were Mrs. Hutchinson, Madame Clara Gardiner, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Henry Blower, and Mr. Frederic King. The choir was one of the largest ever assembled in the Albert Hall to perform an oratorio, and the same remark may be applied to the band, which, in addition to performers from Birmigham and Derby, included many of the best local players. Mr. T. M. Abbot, of Birmingham, admirably led the orchestra; Mr. J. W. Phillips presided with his well-known skill and ability at the organ, and Mr. T. Tallis Trimnell conducted the performance in a manner which calls for the greatest commendation. In every respect the work was finely rendered, the "March to Calvary," and all the instrumental pieces, creating a marked effect. Amongst the vocal music must be especially mentioned the number entitled "The holy women at the sepulchre," the beautiful solo and chorus "From Thy love asa Father"—the splendid singing of the solo evoking the most sympass, "and the final section, "The hymn of the Apostles," in which Gounou appears at his best, and which brings the work to a triumphant close. The performance was listened to by a large and most sympathetic audience.

STAVELEX.—On Monday evening, December 29, a Concert of STAYELEV.—On Monday evening, December 20, a Concert of vocal and instrumental music, promoted by the Staveley Branch of the Church of England Working Men's Society, was given in the schoolroom in aid of the funds of the Society's institute. The artists were Madame Daglish, Mr. Bingley Shaw, Mr. J. Lancaster (vocalists) Mr. Wallhead (voidin), Mr. Keeton (violoncello), Captain L. Butler Bowden (concertina), Mr. N. B. Hibbert, Miss 'Esiher, and Miss Turner (pianoforte). The Concert was in every respect a success.

Srow.—On the 16th ult. the fourth of a course of Lectures, delivered under the auspices of the Literary Institute in the Town Hall, was given by Mr. W. C. Stevenson an "The Modern Song." The lecturer's remarks upon "Folk-Song, Artistic Song, and National Song," were highly interesting; and illustrations from the works of modern composers were contributed with much effect by Mr. T. S. Stevenson and Mr. Smith. There was a large audience.

TURSHIDGE WELLS.—On Saturday afternoon, the 17th ult., an interesting Violin Recital was given by Mr. Carrodus at the Great Hall, before a large and appreciative audience. The programme was excellently selected, and included Bach's Chaconne in D minor, Fernat's "Carrival of Venice," a Romance and Tarantella by Tours, Paganini's "Moto Perpetuo," &c., all of which were admirably performed, and warmly received. Vocal places were contributed by Miss Bertha Moore, who by her artistic and symphetic singing thoroughly deficient of the programment of the research. Miss Ada Bright was an efficient execution of the relaters. Miss Ada Bright was an WAKEFELD.—A highly impressive rendering of Gounod's Redemp-tion was given at the Parish Church on December 27, the work taking the place of the authem in the evening service. The solos were all sung with excellent effect, and the choruses given with much pre-cision and devotional feeling throughout. The accompaniments were most skillfully played on the organ by Mr. J. Emmerson, and the com-position was listened to with carnest extention by about 1,800 persons.

WALSALL.—The Choral Association gave an excellent performance of The Messiah, in the Temperance Hail, on Monday, the 5th ult. The vocalists were Miss Adelina Clarka, Miss Emilie Harris, Mr. C. Breese, and Mr. J. Lander. Mr. J. C. Clarke conducted.

WIRKSWORTH.—On Tuesday, December 30, Mr. E. Birch (professor of music) gave an evening Concert in the Town Hall, assisted by Miss Annie Street, Miss F. Birch, Mr. Bingley Shaw (vocalists); Miss G. M. Birch (pianoforte), and Mr. E. Birch (concertina and piano). Miss F. Birch was encored for her songs, and Miss Birch's performance on the pianowas especially admired. Mr. Shaw's singing produced, exertise parameters.

Wiffman—On Tuesday, the 13th ult., the third Concert of the Musical Society was given in the Literary Institution. The first part of the programme consisted of a selection from the oratorios, and the Second part was secular. The professional vocalists were Miss Jeanie Rosse and Mr. Roofe, both of whom were highly successful. Soprano and tenor solos were also given by Miss Ethel Butler and Mr. F. Brown in a perfectly satisfactory style. The band and chorus numbered about sixty performers, the performance evidencing careful preparation by Mr. Howlett, who conducted. Miss E. Hawkins presided at the pisanoforte with taste and skill.

WOLVERHAMPTON .- The performance of Haydn's Creation by the WOLVERHAMPION—And Periodinance of Rayan's organism by an Festival Choral Society, at the Agricultural Hall, on December 29, was in every respect a decided success. The choruses were excellently sung throughout; and the solicists—Miss Mary Davies, Mr. Robert Hilton, and Mr. Bywater—were thoroughly satisfactory. Miss Davies in "With verdure Caid," Mr. Hilton in the whole of the music assigned in "With verdure Caid," Mr. Hilton in the whole of the music assigned to Raphael, and Mr. Bywater, in the well-known air "In native worth," being especially effective. Great credit is due to Dr. Heap, who conducted, for the care and intelligence with which he has trained the Choir. Mr. Roper presided at the harmonium, and most ably accom-YORK .- Herr Padel gave a Pianoforte and Violin Recital at the xork,—Herr Fadei gave a Fanotorte and violin Recital at the Yorkshire Fine Art and Industrial institution, on the 23rd ult, assisted by Miss Hammond and Herr H. Dittmar. Beethoven's Sonata Appassionata, a Nocturne and Polonaise by Chopin, and compositions by Vieuxtemps, Grieg, and Mozskowski formed the pro-gramme, which was much appreciated by a large audience.

THE POPULAR CANTATA

WILFORD MORGAN.

This charming work, founded on Bunyan's allegory, has been performed with the greatest possible success by many Choral Societies both in Great Britain and the Colonies. In many instances a second performance has been given owing to its success. It is full of melody, and both choruses and solo parts are most effective. Worthy the attention of all who desire a successful work. Price 3s. net; Harmonium Accompaniment, 2s. 6d. set.

PHILIPPI

THE WORDS BY THE REV. J. POWELL METCALFE

E. GLADSTONE,

Mus. Doc., Cantab.

Full Score and Band parts may be had on hire.

"Dr. Gladstone having intended his work for church use, we expect to find the music solid in character, sober in expression, and liberally contrapuntal. In this we are not disappointed. . Flimsiness and tricky effect would be out of harmony with the spirit of English church music, and Dr. Gladstone has avoided both with indisputable success. . . . There is abundance of talent in the work."—Daily Telegraph.

"Dr. Gladstone's music to the words is learned and clever without being abstruse or unvocal; on the contrary, the several numbers are so written as to bring their own interest both to the singers and to the hearers. . . With a view to enlisting the sympathies of those who listen to music for the immediate effect it produces, or for its approach as the product of the production with words, Dr. Gladstone has contrived his design most aby. It may, therefore, be recommended to the consideration of church choirs and choral societies with every confidence."—Morning

"The composer expresses his thoughts in a clear and pleasing nanner. The voice parts are soberly and effectively written." manner.

"The purely religious style of Dr. Gladstone is admirably suited for the subject he has chosen; for although throughout the Canata he has most sympathetically coloured the incidents of the narrative in no part has he been betrayed into an ultra-dramatic setting of the events which would in the slightest degree unfit the work for the sacred locality which should be its natural home. . . . We heartily welcome so excellent a specimen of church oratorio as the one now under notice."—Musical Times.

PASSION SERVICE

FOR THE SEASON OF

ALFRED R. GAUL.

COMPOSER OF THE "HOLY CITY," &C

"On the evening of Good Friday, the congregation of St. Augustine's Church were invited to attend the first performance of their organist's new sacred work—a musical illustration of subjects connected with the 'Passion' of the Saviour. In this fresh musical product Mr. Gaul has the advantage of an open field, till very recently closed almost entirely to the Anglican Church composer; so that at the outset his work claims the metrit of distinctiveness. The text of Mr. Gaul's work, varied and elaborate in structure, is the compilation of the Rev. J. C. Blissard, author at the same time of the original lyrical portions of the work. The course of sacred events connected with the Passion is laid out by the writer so as to form a series of six distinct's scenes,' the literary construction of these being similar in plan throughout, but each preserving its own separate unity and point of narrative or dramatic interest. The subjects of these divisions, each occupied with a particular stage of the Mystery or capacity of the Mystery of t

BIRMINGHAM DAILY MAIL.

"A second experience simply confirms the remark hazarded on the first presentation—viz., that the work is not only the most important Mr. Gaul has yet given to the world of art, but is one that, when familiar, must arrest attention."

The Organist's Quarterly Journal

PUBLISHED ON THE FIRST OF JANUARY, APRIL, JULY, AND OCTOBER.

Subscribers, 2s. 6d. per Quarter; Non-Subscribers, 5s. each Part.

Subscribers, 2s. 6d. per Quarter: Non-Subscribers, 5s. each Part.

"The January part of the Organist's Quarterly Journal, edited by Dr. Spark, of Leeds (Novello and Co.), maintains the excellent and useful character which the work has deservedly won through a series of more than sixteen years. There are interesting compositions for the king of instruments by Otto Dienel, of Berlin; C. W. Pearce, Mus. Doc.; Paul R. Barclay, Stephen Kemp, and Julus Katterfeldt, all of which are worthy of the best attention from organists. The wide and extensive knowledge of the editor, and his large sympathies with all schools of organ music, have guided him in the choice of a election encouragement. Make his wolumes almost unique in value. The encouragement have been brought into direct communication with each encouragement have been brought into direct communication with each could see by means of its pages how the process of development in organ writing and playing was being brought about and carried on. Young composers have found kind and genial help from a friendly editor, who, but for him, might have 'blushed unseen' and spoken unheard. With single-minded purpose has succeeded in proving to the world that whatever defects there may be in the character of English art in other forms of expression, in organ composition our native musicians are fully equal to the acknowledged best writers of the Continent in their own particular line. While for the purposes of performance the collection is invaluable, it also stands as a monument of the industry, energy, and perseverance of the compiler."

FROM THE DUNDEE ADVERTISER.

"This number, 64, closes the eighth volume of Dr. Spark's important 'Quarterly,' a work which, for exteen years now, has been the true friend alike of organists and composers of this and other countries; which has furnished the player with original compositions in every variety of style, all good and useful, many of them of the highest value, and given to the latter an incentive to work their best for the advancement of a noble art. . . The undiminished vitality of this journal abundantly shows that the editorial labour of Dr. Spark on its behalf may well continue for years to come."

Subscribers' names received by Messrs, Novello, Ewer and Co., who will also furnish contents of the Eight Complete Volumes already published, any number in which can be obtained separately. Editor's address, Newton Park, Leeds.

DR. SPARK'S NEW ORGAN PIECE.

FANTASIA IN

DEDICATED TO DR. E. J. HOPKINS.

From the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

"This is one of many effective contributions to the organist's library by which Dr. Spark, the skilled organist of the Leeds Town Hall, has made his name eminent as a composer for, as well as a performer on, the 'king of instruments.' The piece now referred to consists of three movements—'Allegro moderato,' Andante espressivo,' and 'Finale'—each of which is well calculated to display the varied powers of a grand organ. The fantasia is published by Novello, Ewer and Co."

"Dr. Spark played his own brilliant Fantasia in F last evening on the grand organ in St. Andrew's Hall, where, by a large and critical audience, it was very warmly applauded and highly appreciated. Undoubtedly it is a clever and most effective composition."

VOICE-TRAINING EXERCISES

CHARLES W. PEARCE.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS, &c.

"Tenbury, July 14, 1884. "My dear Sir,-I am much obliged to you for sending me your Voice Exercises. They seem to me admirable, and doubtless will prove of Exercises. They seem to include great utility.—I am, yours faithfully,

"Frederick A. G. Ouselby."

" October 4, 1884. "I like the Vocal Exercises very much; they are scientific, systematic, and ingenious. "TOHN STAINER."

"This is a novel work, both in plan and detail, and the combined labours of a well-known scientific lecturer on the voice and an excellent musician have brought the undertaking to a successful issue. . . . The exercises are melodious and attractive, and are planned to do their work without the possibility of strain or fatigue. The pianoforte part is everywhere judicious and artistic. These very complete and satisfactory training exercises are printed in six different books for the same number of voices, thus: soprano, mezzo-soprano, contralto, tenor, baritone, and bass. The work may be safely and cordially recommended to vocal students and even to practised singers, quite apart from any grounds of discussion concerning methods of teaching."-Musical Standard, August 30, 1884.

"The conjunction of science and musicianship expressed by the names of the two authors of this well thought of and well carried out work is a sufficient guarantee as to its objectivity and musical adaptability. . . . The exercises are, with great skill, arranged so as to give a maximum of benefit with a minimum of fatigue. They are melodious and natural, and are consequently pleasant of performance. accompanying pianoforte part is helpful without being either distracting or unduly prominent; and the work is throughout characterised by artistic forethought and good musicianship. Its popularity will doubtless be extensive in accordance with its merits."-Academic Gazette, September 1, 1884.

"They are constructed so as to fit in with the vocal principles which Mr. Behnke teaches, while at the same time they are melodious and interesting."-Tonic Sol-fa Reporter, August, 1884.

"This is a valuable series of vocal studies, based on the principles advocated in 'The Mechanism of the Human Voice,' by E. Behnke, and in the more elaborate work, by Messrs. Lennox Browne and Emil Behnke, entitled 'Voice, Song, and Speech.' . . . The exercises are published for each of the several rarges of voice, and from their utility and cheapness they deserve to find a very large sale."-Jllust. London News, August 9, 1884.

"They will not only be found most valuable and admirably adapted to the purpose for which they were written, but they are at the same time melodious and attractive. The work is quite devoid of theory, for which the authors refer elsewhere, and it is divided into progressive parts, each part containing exercises on the various details requiring cultivation and development in the production of a good voice. These exercises are the best of the kind we have seen, and clearly printed and neatly got up. We wish the authors every success in their endeavours to facilitate the cultivation of vocal art."— Public Opinion, September 12, 1884.

"A personal experience in my own family enables me to speak in the highest terms of Mr. Behnke's method, which is absolutely invaluable for increasing the power, resonance, and flexibility of the voice, both in speaking and singing, and I am glad to be able to recommend the exercises as being thoroughly practical and most useful."-C. D., Household Words, October 11, 1884.

"The combined simplicity and utility of the plan upon which these studies have been written will commend them to the notice of pro-fessors and students alike. Theoretical subjects are wisely eschewed, and the books deal solely with matters that concern the actual training of the voice. Proper importance has been lent to the system of production, and the exercises on Resonance and Attack will especially be found excellent. Altogether Messrs. Behnke and Pearce's studies are of a description that cannot fail to be used with beneficial effect."-Sunday Times, August 31, 1884.

"That the work is based upon sound philosophical principles is certain, and it may be said with confidence that no better exercises for the purposes of voice cultivation are to be met with. No attempt is made to teach the art of singing from notes. The compilers' efforts have been directed to special objects-the production of pure vocal tone and the power of commanding the vocal organs-and we can confidently recommend the publication to those who are pursuing these objects."-Birmingham Gazette, August 14, 1884.

"The exercises are emphatically practical; but they are enhanced in value by pretty and attractive melody, occasionally rising far above the character of mere training compositions."-Salisbury Times, August 2, 1884.

"The authors have conferred a great boon on the musical world and on the public generally by the publication of these exercises, which so happily combine science with simplicity, and system with The very youngest pupils will feel and enjoy all this, and the elder ones will see that a new era has dawned in instruction books for singers."-Oldham Evening Chronicle, August 19, 1884.

METZLER'S ORGANO - PIANOS

THESE NEW INSTRUMENTS may be justly described as inaugurating a new epoch in the development of the Pianoforte.

The distinctive feature of the Organo-Piano consists in its capacity for sustaining the tone for any length of time, and producing without effort the most striking crescendo and diminuendo effects hitherto only possible in wind instruments. It has thus an entirely different effect from that generally known and described as "sostenuto" or "sostenente," &c.

The invention is of the simplest character possible, is most facile of action, can be detached by a slight movement of the hand, leaving the instrument as an ordinary Pianoforte, and re-attached with the same ease. The patentees have the pleasure of stating that the great virtuoso, Liszt, has already given two Recitals on one of these instruments, and pronounced the effect altogether novel and charming.

To all interested in the study of the Pianoforte, a trial of the Organo-Piano is recommended; beauties of musical effect hitherto unthought of being easily attainable on this instrument.

Words by NELLA; Music by HENRY PARKER.

Peace to the sleep of the hero, Peace to the sieep of the nero, Witersver his grave may be; In the sands of the burning desert, In the depths of the troubled sea. Where er his fate o'ertook him, In the silent dungeon keep, In the roar of the mighty battle, Peace to the hero's sleep!

Peace to the sleep of the hero,
Be hallowed his quiet grave
By the thought of the wrongs he righted,
By the sorrows he sought to save.
Enshrined in stately marble,
Or where moss and daisles creep:
Until God's own good day of walking,
Peace to the hero's sleep!

PROSPECTUS.

Some years have passed since Mr. Joseph Bennett began, in the Musical Times, a series of biographical notices which are still far from ended. The original purpose was a limited one-namely, to throw light upon the personality of famous musicians by means of extracts selected and arranged from their letters and other writings. Hence the series had for first title "The Great Composers, sketched by themselves."

Consequent upon the remarkable favour with which the notices

Consequent upon the remarkable favour with which the notices were received, it was determined to extend their scope, and, while making prominent the Meters' own testimony, to deal with each subject in a complete biograms of the area allowed by the limits necessarily imposed. The word "sketched by themselves" were therefore dropped from the title.

It was further resolved to make additions in the case of the composers dealt with under the original idea, and to issue the notices aeparately as "Frimers of Musical Biography." The intention of "Novellos Primers of Musical Biography" is to convey, as clearly as the limits of an elementary work will allow, a just idea of each composer's personality, and to record the principal events of his life. Knowledge of what a man is helps the understanding of what he does. These little books may aerve, therefore, as a first step towards acquaintance with the genius and compositions of the masters to whom they are devoted. to whom they are devoted.

For the copious extracts made from letters, &c., throughout the series, no apology is offered. They are the best material upon which to base an estimate of character.

OBSERVATIONS ON MUSIC IN AMERICA

By Joseph Bennett.

A RESIDENCE of several months in the United States-during which time I traversed the country from Illinois to Texas, and from New York to San Francisco-enabled me to take note of the condition of music among our cousins. In giving my impressions upon this subject, I hope to be perfectly frank and straightforward-always, that is to say, mentioning circumstances which may have limited the scope of my observation, or tended to prevent it from being other than superficial. Some such conditions are inevitable where the observer cannot stay long in one place, or is brought into contact with but a section of society. It must be said, however, that the courtesy and kindness of my American friends gave me unwonted facilities for learning whatever I desired to know. About the gracefulness and thoroughness of their hospitality I could say much. In every city lying across the track of my wanderings I was made to feel at home by musical professors and amateurs of whose existence even, in many cases, I had no previous knowledge. Let me thank them heartily through the convenient columns of a journal read by them all. But gratefulness stands somewhat in the way of my present task, since, as regards music in America, I cannot "prophesy smooth things" from beginning to end of the story. Indeed, I may have to utter words that sound hard and harsh. American friends, however, will not suspect me of setting down aught in malice, or credit me with exaggerating and suppressing fact. I know the national susceptibility about the opinions of foreigners, and especially of Englishmen. Nothing more keenly exercises an American's mind than an unfavourable remark from a "cousin" regarding anything that is his. He lives so constantly amid evidences of extraordinary achievement and still more astonishing possibilities that unfavourable criticism comes upon him with a shock which, for a time, is staggering. I will give a case in point. an "express" train between New Orleans and New York I had as fellow passenger and gossip a New England manufacturer. At first we got on very well together, but, in a moment of disgust at travelling that barely exceeded twenty miles an hour, I remarked, "This is called an express train!" My friend guessed it was. I continued, "In England we should term it a bad third-class." Alas for my rashness! I had pained the New Englander, and, till we arrived in the Empire City, he continued at intervals to asseverate that if America chose she could build better railways, better engines, and travel faster than was possible in the worn-out old country. At odd moments I saw his eyes fixed upon me in astonishment mingled with grieved expostula-tion. No doubt he was really hurt, and, as we shook hands in New Jersey "Depôt," his parting words were: "Well, if we don't travel as fast as some people, I guess we get safely to the end of the journey." Susceptibility so alert as this must be taken into consideration by critics of America who would not give needless offence. I will try to keep it in view.

It may not be amiss, before entering the region of will ask my reader to consider with me the condition in which we should expect to find American music, having regard to all the circumstances of the case. Doing this, we must first determine the circumstances. The people of the United States are mainly Anglo-Saxon and Celtic, the first-named family predominating. Different observers may take different views as to the import of this fact. There are some who contend that the Anglo-Saxons are musical by nature. Others protest that they are nothing of the kind, beyond the power of finding pleasure in sweet sounds. Taking up neither side here, I am satisfied to indicate the unassailable truth that Anglo-Saxons, in the field of musical achievement, are behind the other leading races of the world-inferior, that is to say, to the Teutons, the Latins, and the Sclavs. If the reader agree with me in this, as I think he must, we have one piece of firm ground to stand upon. The deduction is, of course, unfavourable to music in America. Ethnologists tell us that the influence of habitat is so great upon man as to effect a marked change in his physical aspect under certain conditions; but there is no reason to believe that a corresponding mental and emotional transformation goes on. The Anglo-Saxon of America is essentially the Anglo-Saxon of Europe, differing only as to the measure in which the chief characteristics of the race are more accentuated in the first than in the second. We have no right, therefore, to look among our transatlantic relatives for any larger development of musical taste and practice than that which exists among ourselves. Let us proceed a step farther, and ask whether, under the actual conditions, we are entitled to look for an equal development.

Inter arma silent leges. Similarly, when the energies of a people are consecrated to the acquisition of what may be called material resources, art is of necessity, and to a great extent, neglected. In The MUSICAL TIMES for June of last year I had an opportunity of dwelling upon this thesis, with special reference to our own country. It is, I know, gross egotism for a man to quote himself, but perhaps I may be allowed, as a matter of convenience, to make one short extract. Touching upon the development of music in England during the Elizabethan age and its subsequent decline, I said:

"The extreme virulence of Puritanism had scarcely abated when a new influence began to work against music. Over the whole country came the rage of empire, and that passion for wealth whence has sprung our enormous commercial development, with all its attendant circumstances, as, for example, the conquest of India. There was no time in those days for cultivating the gentler arts, and such knowledge as the people had gained of them in quieter years We were filibustering over the globe; died out. subduing Asiatics with fire and sword, and warring with every power that owned a colony, till the prize fell to the dauntless valour of an imperial race. short, we were busy empire-making-a very absorbing pursuit. We went on, in a large national way, adding house to house and land to land, till, as it by the fact that the nation is musically sufficient seemed, the man who did not help the process by unto itself. How can we look for these proofs to a going into 'business' or using a sword was a poor creature fit only to be looked down upon.'

Mutatis mutandis, these words apply to America not less closely than to England. For what has been the story of America since the British flag was hauled down to make way for the star-spangled banner? It has been a story of conquest over nature in the sense of the command, "replenish the earth and subdue it." We have had before our eyes—and the spectacle, to a very great extent, is still therethe process of building up a national home. Ground has been cleared; foundations have been laid; walls erected, and beams fixed in their places. To and furnishing-our cousins have not yet come. They will tell us this with proud and natural complacency, and they will own that the time to settle down, with some sort of leisure for the graces of a completed residence, is still in the future. The United States, in point of fact, contain no leisured class such as we know in England. By leisured I do not mean lazy. Leisured men in England are amongst our most active and hardest-working citizens, though their exertions do not always take a form profitable to the community. All Americans, on the other hand, labour in some sort of business, tending to their own enrichment, if not involving, as often it does not, any form of production by which the wealth of the nation generally is increased. In the present circumstances of America this universal devotion to materialism in a gross form is a natural and may even be an advantageous circumstance. It hastens on, at any rate, the earlier and rougher processes through which every national fabric has to pass. But it involves serious drawbacks; among them the setting up of wealth as the determining element of social standing and influence. Here, to avoid the possibility of misconception, let me observe that I speak very generally, and with due recognition of much that is exceptional. The larger cities of the United States, Boston unquestionably being at their head, contain a section of society as refined, as cultured, and as free from the influence of low standards of social merit as any to be found in the countries of Europe. Of this, it is true, the average visitor sees little; the exclusiveness of the circle is proportioned to the danger of its being broken in upon and debased. Leaving out of question the true American aristocracy of culture, we have a nation in which the rich man, qua rich man, is the. social king, and where his doings and sayings are recorded with the faithful minuteness of a Court Circular. Should any question be raised on this point I would refer the doubter to omnipresent evidence afforded by the American passion for outward display. Wealth, to produce its effect of homage to the possessor, must be shown, and no country in the world more ostentatiously exhibits its outward and visible signs.

To argue, from all the circumstances just stated, that art, as a living power, cannot co-exist with them, seems to me easy enough. Of course, in America, as among ourselves, there is much patronage of art. Pictures and statuary find a ready market, and musical performances are largely attended. But the productions of the easel and the chisel can be turned into mere proof of buying power, and attendance upon performances, as we English well know, may result from no higher motive than a desire to discharge certain social duties, or do that which is fashionable and right. The question whether music is or is not a living power must be decided not by patronage but by individual devotion, by evidence that musical culture is universal and successful, and young community engaged in developing the resources of a new land, and chiefly worshipping, after the most natural manner in the world, evidence of success in that great work. So to do would be to ignore all experience and the teaching of history. I am pointing out all this not by way of reproach far from it-but as features connected with a stage in the natural growth of a nation-of an Anglo-Saxon nation more especially; and the conclusion pointed to is that we are not entitled to look for other than elementary musical development within the still young and growing Republic.

Let us advance a step further with our speculation. the finishing ouches-to the operations of adornment | America being insufficient unto herself in musical things, yet, for various reasons, a patron of music, we expect to find that the practice of the art has fallen into the hands of foreigners, as was, at one time, greatly our own case, and, to some extent, is We cannot be at a loss in deciding upon the nation most likely to occupy so promising a field. Beyond doubt it must be the nation which stands above all others in respect of musical achievement and culture; which is constantly pouring from an overcrowded and impoverished home-market a stream of more or less qualified professors anxiously searching for a spot on which to settle, and whose musical sons and daughters carry with them a prestige far more valuable than any personal recommendation. Germany may not possess America entirely to herself is likely enough, since France and Italy-to a small extent even England-must be reckoned with. But these nationalities we should expect to find out-numbered by Teutonic fecundity and outpaced by Teutonic perseverance. At any rate, German music, German practice of music, and German ideas concerning it must, in the nature of the case, surpass all others; the more easily because backed up by a numerous, influential, and increasing German element in the population. Assuming that the conclusions just arrived at be correct, grave reflections arise out of them. We see, for example, a young nation at its most impressionable age passing, as regards music, into the hands of aliens, who are shaping its tastes by a foreign model rather than in accordance with natural instinct and promptings. Some may reply to this: "Looking at the condition of the art in England, an old and fully developed Anglo-Saxon nation, we see no evidence, as a racial characteristic, of distinctive musical instinct and promptings." I grant that the superficial observer would find an answer to the objection somewhat difficult. Looking deeper and closer the reply is indeed easy. Till the entire national energies of England were absorbed, as those of America now are, by the work of building up an empire, we were amongst the most musical of European peoples. In compositions of the Church and madrigalian schools-there were hardly any other-we held our own with the best, and maintained our position till Puritanism on the one hand, and the lust of conquest and wealth on the other did their deadly work. Then, as everybody knows, the alien came in to provide music for a people engrossed with material cares and not disposed to furnish it for themselves. We have since been to a large extent Germanised, anticipating, under almost parallel circumstances, the experience through which America is passing. Now a race can no more change its nature than an Ethiopian can alter the colour of his skin. Instincts may be held down, but no force can eradicate them, and the British capacity for music, which shone so luminously three centuries ago, still exists, waiting for the redemption that seems, indeed, close at hand. Its renewed development must, in the nature of things, resuscitate whatever was distinctive in the national musical utterance and give us once more our own dialect. As with Anglo-Saxons in the old home, so, other things being equal, with those who have gone across the sea. may be told that there is only one real musical utterance, and that all talk about national dialects is mischievous nonsense. As respectfully as possible, under the circumstances, I beg to reply that men who would speak like this must be purblind. Every nation in the world that can be called musical in a Italy cannot be confounded with that of Germany, reports are spiced till they taste, to a foreigner, somethat of Germany with the music of France, while thing more than "hot i' the mouth"; the sensational members of the great Sclavonian family differ from all. This is well. We want no pre-Babel uniformity in the musical world, where "one language and one speech" would be a misfortune. The question is whether every nationality possesses the power to develop a distinctive musical utterance, having to a greater or less extent its own inflections. Arguing from the known to the unknown, there is reason for believing that, under favourable circumstances, it can. In some measure even England has done so. The works of our old church composers bear an unmistakable stamp of origin-it is significant to observe that English church music occupies a conspicuous place in America-while our national and patriotic ballads are things entirely sui generis. This may not be much to boast of, but it is enough for the present argument; and I shall assume that in the distant future, when the various elements composing the American people shall have consolidated and the nation shall have had time to develop art, there will be such a thing as American music. Looking forward to this consummation, it cannot be considered a hopeful sign that the field we expect to bear the crop is now occupied by an alien nationality, which is preparing the soil after its own fashion and dropping in its own seed. At present, unquestionably, the Germans are determining the future of American music, as far as that may be done by a foreign people at the distance of time which separates us from the era when it is at all likely that American music will take form.

Our speculation now goes a step further. Having regard to the conditions already set forth, what class of German music should we expect to find "exhibited" in the United States? Clearly not that-I am speaking very generally—which demands a measure of classical training and taste for its appreciation; nor that which appeals to intellectual perception rather than superficial feeling. A young and busy nation, engaged in the rough work of erecting its house and clearing its "lot" has no time for classical culture. The thing does not pay in a material form. It ranks among the resources of unproductiveness, which the healthy instinct of a people having hard work on hand cannot bring itself to tolerate. Nor is the characteristic restlessness of Americans favourable to the condition of mind which finds delight in the more abstract forms of music. Even physical circumstances—if I may indulge a fancy of my own and say so - are against this. Americans live and move and have their being in a stimulative atmosphere. I expect to hear the crackling of electricity every time they pass their fingers through their hair. Normally at high pressure, their relaxation—the word is a misnomer—consists in change from high pressure to a higher. English people are often amused at the lightning speed with which their transatlantic relatives "do" the old countries; rushing here and there as though, like Shakespeare's goblin, they would "put a girdle round the earth in forty minutes." Such activity has become a condition of existence. They would not be themselves under a slow and humdrum routine, and by this circumstance even the amusements of the people are largely determined. Society is a whirl of excitement; a drive is not a sedate English progress, but a rushing through the air behind a fast horse having the blood of a "2"5" in his veins; travels for pleasure are genuine globe trottings covering degrees of longitude or latitude by the score, popular elections pass like whirlwinds, exciting pasparticular sense has its own dialect. The music of sions that seem on the verge of disorder, newspaper in character and mode of expression the various novel circulates by the million, and from the stage of real life to that of the antic is a step from one strong experience to a stronger. Music cannot escape the universal stress. We should expect it to be in demand, but of a sort—something that shall quicken the jaded nerve-centres; send thrills down the spine, fill the ear and brain with stimulating noises, and rouse the imagination with the sensuous or the terrible. In this case the conditions determining the future of American music would certainly not be healthy. Art is not born amid turmoil, or nursed by the light of blue fire. It is the growth of that peace and quiet amid which the inwardness of humanity most easily finds its way outward, and the soul appears in embodied forms. As regards musical literature, including musical criticism (which is sometimes not literature), we should expect to find it largely in the hands of those by whom music in America is carried on. Assuming this, its character would not be difficult of forecast. We should look to it for earnestness, considerable want of sympathy beyond certain lines, and lack of the wide culture only to be found where sympathies also are wide. To some extent, moreover, we might expect to see in musical literature and journalism a reflex of the mingled shrewdness and humour which the native American brings to the consideration of all the lighter concerns of life. As a critic he would largely lighten the ponderosity of the German, and knowing less, perhaps, would interest his readers more. He would not lose himself in reflective mazes; would never boast of having studied "physiological psychology," whatever that fearsome term may mean, and would try honestly to see good in all things, because being the special champion of none. How far these conclusions agree with facts, as I observed them, will appear in the proper place.

I should like to point out, in a final paragraph of this preliminary dissertation, how full of interest is the musical state of America, and how big with possibilities. Ethnologically the same interest exists. "Saxon and Norman and Dane are we," sang the Laureate years ago; but the future laureate of the "States" will have to extend the list far beyond three items. The whole civilised world is pouring ingredients into the American furnace. What will come out in the day when the nation takes its mould? Who can tell, save that, in all probability, it will be something rich and strange? So from this new amalgam of humanity may arise forms of art such as the world has never yet looked upon. Let the issue be as it may, we are watching the early creative processes, and they should be to us of deep and abiding interest; the more because in them our own

SPITTA'S BACH.*

The thoughts of musicians throughout the world are at the present time directed towards the two mighty workers in the art who may with equal fitness be termed the last of the early masters and the first of the glorious race of modern tone-poets. We cannot recall two names of eminence in any other art who occupy a position analogous to that of Handel and Bach in the history of music. They stand like twin giant mountains dividing the regions of the past from the present, and partaking in about equal proportions of the characteristics of each. Speaking at the Musical Association a few weeks ago Sir George Macfarren said that there seemed something almost providential in the contemporaneous appearance of two such men, born within a few days of each other, directed into widely differing channels of labour, and destined never to meet; yet each exercising a colossal power in the field of art, neither being complete in himself, but each the complement of the other. At one period it seemed that the labours of Bach had been in vain, so far as posterity was concerned. But time, the last judge of appeal in such matters, has restored the balance and given him as lofty a pedestal in the temple of fame as his great Anglo-Saxon brother. And now, as we said at the outset, music lovers in all countries are bestirring themselves to celebrate in the fittest manner the 200th anniversary of the birth of both these revered masters. How the occasion is to be marked as regards public performances is a matter with which we have no concern in this place. But there are other ways of rendering honour to musical genius, and it will be generally agreed that the completion of the English translation of Spitta's splendid work on John Sebastian Bach, within a few weeks of the bi-centenary festival, is at least a singularly happy coincidence. Henceforth English musicians will not be able to plead any excuse for ignorance of even the smallest detail concerning Bach as a man and a composer. encyclopædic nature of Herr Spitta's work has already been pointed out. He has thoroughly exhausted his subject, and though other essays, either biographical or critical, will doubtless appear from time to time, it is extremely unlikely that their authors will be able to tell us anything fresh con-cerning Bach himself or the musical history of his

At the end of the second volume of the English version, Bach was left firmly established at Leipzig. A general impression prevails that his life there was perfectly tranquil, and undisturbed by difficulties with those with whom he was associated in the Thomasschule. This was far from being the case, and the account Spitta gives of certain disputes is interesting as affording an insight into the character of the man. In our notice of the second volume we mentioned the unpleasantness which arose from Things im-Bach's neglect of his teaching work. proved under the new rector, Johann Matthias Gesner, between whom and Bach a warm friendship existed. But, unfortunately, in 1734, Gesner received an appointment at the University of Göttingen, and his successor, Johann August Ernesti, proved a less agreeable superior officer. At first all went well, and Ernesti stood godfather to two of Bach's sons. Unpleasantnesses arose out of trifling matters connected with the discipline of the school, and Bach, with the sturdy obstinacy which seems to have been a marked trait of his disposition, absolutely refused to give way in matters affecting the dignity of his office. At last he appealed to the Court, who for a while did not take any notice of the application, and then declared both parties to be in the wrong. This did not satisfy the Cantor, who next appealed to the Consistory, a higher authority, and finally to the king, who at once called upon the Consistory to settle the matter, which they did in a manner favourable to Bach. Spitta relates these petty squabbles with minute details, and attaches importance to them as they led Bach to accept outside appointments. This gives occasion for an interesting account of the growth of public musical performances outside the church—in other words, the establishment of the Concert. By connecting himself with various musical societies which sprang up about the time, his fame rapidly grew. "His illustrious position was firmly rooted in the mind of the inhabitants, and nothing could now shake it. He was the glory of their city; no musician of repute ever visited it without paying his respects to Bach. Pupils streamed to and fro, and to be received by him was a coveted honour." Alas, that even before his death this brilliancy began to wane. "Though still admired, he had ceased to be understood or loved." It is very difficult at the present day to understand why a musician with such unparalleled gifts should not have obtained increasing recognition as time wore on. Spitta compares his experience with that of Beethoven, whose star faded before the popular Rossini. But no Rossini challenged the supremacy of Bach in Leipzig. On the contrary, the history of music in North Germany for many years after his death is absolutely barren as regards the appearance of any composers of genius. Nor did the general forgetfulness of himself and his works arise from any fundamental changes of taste in musical circles. It was still in the severer forms of the art that activity chiefly manifested itself, and we know how Mozart was struck with the contrast between sober Berlin and his own gay and tuneloving Vienna. In this regard, Bach occupies a unique place in the art. Records are to hand of composers enjoying the sunshine of popular favour during their lives only to be utterly contemned and forgotten by posterity. Others, again, have been in advance of their age and have died broken-hearted, leaving their works to receive justice at the hands of a younger generation. Bach did not belong to either of these classes. Considering the sphere in which he moved, his genius received a fair amount of homage during his life; but then its lustre faded almost from sight, and has since revived in a manner that must satisfy those who conscientiously believe in the principles of eternal justice. There is no further occasion to organise a crusade in his favour. He now speaks in irresistible tones to all who have any feeling for music; and if we need tangible proof of the power he wields, it may be found in the splendid edition of his works now being issued by the German Bach-Gesellschaft, and in the monumental literary labours of Herr

At the same time, it is impossible to read without a feeling of irritation, mingled with sorrow, of the indifference and speedy forgetfulness of his fellow citizens concerning one who had done more for German music than the whole of his predecessors. After his death a few "In Memoriam" performances were given, but so little respect had the Leipzig Town Council for the memory of this illustrious genius that ten days after his departure it was remarked at a meeting that "the school needed a Cantor and not a Capellmeister," and that "Herr Bach had been a great musician, but not a schoolmaster." It was quite in accordance with this failure to recognise Bach's worth that his widow was suffered to feel the pangs of absolute want. Here we cannot do better than quote were ever performed in Dresden, nor that the other Spitta's words :--

"Anna Magdalena, left with three daughters, fell into poverty. In 1752 she was receiving moneys from the town, as she was in need, and had offered some musical relics for sale. Whether the sons could not or would not help is not known, but it is certain that her circumstances became narrower, till at last she lived on public benevolence. She died February 27, 1760, as an 'almswoman,' in a house in the Hainstrasse. Her coffin was followed to the grave by a quarter of the school, as was usual with quite poor folks, and the place of her burial is unknown. The town left the widow of one of its greatest sonsherself, too, an artist-to perish thus. . . . Having creation we discern the power of music to re-unite all followed the course of a great man's life to a close, the warring elements of religious thought. Only in ruin of all that he had constructed and the disposal of all he had held together. What under such circumstances is lost is undoubtedly the least precious portion of what he has created. It is true that Bach's creative spirit worked less actively and fruitfully in the succeeding generation than has often been the case with a great genius. And it is especially in Bach's sons that we may mark the decay of that power which had culminated after several centuries of growth, and which utterly disappeared in their posterity. But in truth, for nearly a century, the whole German nation has entered into that inheritance; it has recovered its connection with Bach, and, through him, with the almost forgotten centuries of its own musical history. The works of his creation -the highest outcome of an essentially national art, whose origin lies in the period of the Reformation-are like a precious seed which bursts the soil at last to be garnered in perennial sheaves. Henceforth it will not be possible that Bach should be forgotten so long as the German people exist. His resurrection, in the works of a later generation of artists, has already begun; but we who are not of the mystic guild have our duty too, each in his degree, to labour that the spirit of the great man may be more widely understood and beloved."

With these fervent words Spitta concludes his great work. Before we pass to the consideration of that portion of the third volume—by far the larger part—which deals with Bach's compositions, we may mention, as an example of the author's characteristic caution, his account of the composer's visit to Frederick the Great, at Potsdam, which previous writers have detailed with infinite gusto, on the authority of the sons, Friedemann and Emanuel. It is suggested that Friedemann may have given the reins to his imagination in his account of the actual reception at the Prussian court, and the oft-quoted details are, therefore, curtly dismissed; while the tangible outcome of the visit, namely, the work known as the "Musikalische Opfer," is discussed at length. One of the most remarkable and valuable sections of the work is the second chapter of the sixth book, which deals with the Masses, and more particularly with the Mass in B minor. As musicians are aware, the other four Masses, at any rate three of them, are for the most part worked up from earlier cantatas, and even the Mass in F cannot be compared (as a representative work) with the colossal B minor. last is sometimes spoken of as a Protestant Mass, and certainly some portions of the communion service were still performed in Latin, in the Lutheran church, in Bach's time. But, to a certain extent, it was the Catholic court of Dresden that the composer had in view in these liturgical settings. The Kyrie and Gloria of the B minor Mass were actually dedicated to the King of Saxony, but there is no proof that they portions of the work were in like manner presented to the Court. No possible doubt can be thrown upon Bach's sturdy Lutheran feelings merely on account of his manifest desire to win the favour of the reigning sovereign. As we have already seen, he was extremely desirous of obtaining appointments which would render him not wholly dependent upon his somewhat uncomfortable post at the Thomasschule. But though his desire to render himself serviceable to the Court induced him to undertake the composition of a full mass, he wrote the work for performance in the Protestant churches of St. Thomas and St. Nicholas, and Spitta declares that in this mighty we will not dwell on the melancholy picture of the certain portions he shows himself subject to the conditions of the Protestant Liturgy. He addressed himself to the "one holy and universal Christian Church," meanwhile preserving his personal fidelity to the principles of the Reformation. Musically, the B minor Mass is almost wholly an original work, the adaptations from previous compositions being few and unimportant. The Gratias Agimus, Qui tollis, Patrem omnipotentem, Crucifixus, Osanna, and Agnus Dei are founded upon movements from the church cantatas, but not one of these has been utilised without modification. Some of these emendations exhibit Bach's genius and poetical feeling in the strongest light. Perhaps the most salient instance occurs in the Crucifixus, which, as musicians know, is built on a ground bass, a descending minor scale of E, which continues with undeviating monotony until the words "Passus, et sepultus est," when it turns upward, and the movement ends with an exquisite cadence in G major. This singularly appropriate cadence is new, while the rest of the section is taken from a cantata chorus, "Weinen, Klagen, Sorgen." We should like to quote freely from Spitta's masterly and eloquent analysis of the Mass, but considerations of space preclude us from giving more than a few sentences, as indicative of the general style, and of his insistance on the definite and almost dramatic significance of the music. Speaking of the Credo, he says, "Its purport is the presentment of the doctrine of the Trinity. Here it was indispensable that the unity of the Father and the Son should be more strongly insisted on than in the Gloria. The duet 'Et in unum' does this by the canonic treatment, which is employed for the instruments as well as the voices. But to represent the essential Unity as clearly as possible, Bach treats the parts in canon on the unison at the beginning of the principal subject each time, not using the canon on the fourth below till the second bar; thus both the unity and the separate existence of the two Persons are brought out. The intention is unmistakable, since the musical scheme allows of the canonic imitation on the fourth below from the very beginning." Then of the Crucifixus he writes thus:-" Beneath the words of the narrative the inner ear may detect a fervent prayer to Jesus-Who once, through His death redeemed the world-that He will vouchsafe evermore to fulfil the work of redemption in all who seek Him. All is pathetic and piteous, but purified from every trace of egotism. . . . When at last the thematic bass is released from its rigid progression, and the chorus sinks into the deep cool repose of the shadow of the grave, the hearer is left under the sense of a tonepractice by the side of which anything that has ever been written for this portion of the Mass is a pale phantom." This is how the author sums up the colossal work:—"The B minor Mass exhibits in the most absolute manner, and on the grandest scale, the deep and intimate feeling of its creator as a Christian and a member of the Church. The student who desires to enter thoroughly into this chamber of his soul must use the B minor Mass as the key; without this we can only guess at the vital powers which Bach brought to bear on all his sacred compositions. When we hear this Mass per-formed, under the conditions indispensable to our full comprehension of it, we feel as though the genius of the last two thousand years were soaring above our heads. There is something almost unearthly in the solitary eminence which the B minor Mass occupies in history. Even when every available means have been brought to bear on the investigation of the bases of Bach's views of art, and of the processes of his culture and development; on the elements he assimilated from without, on the inspirations he derived from within, and from his personal circumstances. that they h When, finally, the universal nature of music comes musicians.

to our aid in the matter, there still remains a last wonder—the lightning flash of the idea of a Mass of such vast proportions, as of waters that have been long gathering to a head, nay, the actual resurrection of the genius of primitive Christianity, and all concentrated in the mind of this one artist—as inscrutable as the secret of life itself." It would greatly conduce to the appreciation of the Mass if every one of the thousands who will doubtless be present at the Albert Hall, on the 21st inst., when the work is to be performed on a hitherto unequalled scale, would carefully study Herr Spitta's glowing essay on its history and construction.

As a matter of course, the later cantatas are dis-As a matter of course, the rater cantagas are cussed at length, and a chapter is devoted to the composer's treatment of Lutheran chorals, and his utilisation of the ancient Church modes. With regard to the latter, Spitta shows that he held no dogmatic views, but availed himself of them from time to time whenever he wished to produce an archaic effect. In his time our modern major mode had firmly established itself, but, as regards the minor, there was much controversy as to the merits of the Dorian, Phrygian, and the Æolian modes. The author, at the close of his remarks on this point, says, "We see how, in the search after a comprehensive minor key, musical feeling wavered for a long time between the Bolian and the Dorian modes." He might have added that even now musicians are by no means agreed as to what is the true form of the minor scale and its proper signature.

Much space is devoted to the consideration of the instrumental works of the Leipzig period-that is to say, the Concertos for clavier, the Suites Anglaises, the Partitas, the so-called second portion of the Wohltemperirte Clavier (the characteristics of which are keenly discussed), the Art of Fugue, and the later organ compositions. The essay on the organ chorals is extremely suggestive, and should be read by organists who make Bach's works a special study. Spitta shows that these pieces (Peters' Edition, Books V., VI., and VII.) were the last efforts of the composer for the instrument, and he declares that they possess a religious significance. "The organ choral is, of all the forms employed by Bach, the most subjective, and it is that which he used most freely. His devotion to it was proved a few days before his death.... To the end he consecrated the highest powers of his life to a form of which the very essence is the joy of praising and praying to God in the congregation. Bach felt like Augustine, that 'Thou hast created us for Thyself, and our heart is unquiet till it finds repose in Thee.'"

In the translation a certain amount of discretion has been used with regard to the original appendices. some portions which were of no interest to English musical readers being omitted. As a matter of course, a copious index is provided. This was absolutely necessary, for an encyclopædic work of these dimensions is chiefly valuable for purposes of reference, and is not intended to be read through as an ordinary biography.

In conclusion, it is due to the translators to compliment them on the manner in which they have discharged an exceptionally arduous task. To say that they have given an ideal rendering of the original would be beyond the mark. It is quite possible for hypercritical readers to declare that a word here, a sentence there, might have been better selected. But, taken as a whole, the work is masterly, and those who have carried it out have the satisfaction of knowing that they have rendered immense service to English

THE BIRTHDAYS OF HANDEL AND BACH

By WILLIAM H. CUMMINGS.

Until recently considerable doubt prevailed as to the precise day and year of Handel's birth. The earliest writers on the subject were Mattheson, who gave the wrong year (1684), and Mainwaring, who named the wrong day and year (February 24, 1684). Again, in translating Mainwaring's book into German, Mattheson adopted both errors; and these have been copied by nearly all subsequent authors.

In Chester's valuable and erudite work, "Westminster Abbey Registers," p. 394, he says, in a note, Handel "was born February 23, 1683-4." I wrote to Colonel Chester on the subject, and received the following reply:-

February 2, 1880.

My DEAR SIR,-I gave the date of Handel's birth from the usual MY DEAR SIR,—I gave the date of Handel's birth from the usual accounts of him, and as it was corroborated by the statements of his age on his coffin plate, I did not think of questioning it. According to the funeral book, which contains copies of the coffin plates, he died in his seventy-sixth year, hence would not have been seventy-sixth until his next birthday, February 23, 1760, and so born February 23, 1633-4. But no one knows better than myself that even coffin plate inscriptions are not always accurate. I do not think I need trouble you to send me the proofs. I accept your statement without hesitation, and thank you very much for giving me the information. It goes at once into my interleaved copy for future use.—Sincerely yours,

There was but little difficulty in correcting the wear, because Handel himself in various places has noted his age; for example, in his autograph score of "Solomon," written in 1748, beneath his signature and the date he added "Ætatis 63"; and at the end of "Susanna," written in 1751, he wrote "Ætatis 66.

The day of birth was more difficult to fix, as the only available evidence on the point was to be found in the Register of Baptisms in the Liebfrauenkirche at Halle, where the following entry is to be found: "1685. Feb. 24. Georg Friederich, son of Herr Georg Handel, Kammerdiener und Amts Chirurgus." As it was the custom of the time to baptise a child the day after birth, it was presumed that Handel's natal day was February 23. I am able to prove the correctness of this assumption by a unique printed document in my possession. It is appended to a funeral oration delivered by J. G. Francke at Halle, January 2, 1731, at the funeral of Handel's mother, under the title "Memoria Defunctæ." Amongst other family matters mention is specially made of "Georg Friederich Handel, born the 23 Febr., Anno 1685." We are, therefore, quite sure in respect of Handel's birthday. Can we be equally certain as to that of his great compeer, John Sebastian

In Spitta's "Life of Bach," published by Novello, Ewer and Co., on page 181, we read, "Bach was born, in all probability, on March 21, 1685; but the only direct evidence we have is the fact that March 23 was the day of baptism."

Mr. Rockstro, in his "Life of Handel," says, "It was the invariable custom, in Protestant Germany, during the seventeenth century, to baptise all infants on the day following that of their birth."

We have seen that this custom was followed in the case of Handel, born only a month before Bach; unless, therefore, some special reason can be shown for a departure from the ordinary routine, is it not probable that Bach was born on March 22—not

It is worth noting that the Gregorian Calendar was adopted in Protestant Germany in 1701; therefore, to be absolutely correct as to the birthdays of both Handel and Bach, we must add ten days to

A BACH MYTH

By WILLIAM H. CUMMINGS.

In Grove's "Dictionary of Music and Musicians," under the name of Johann Sebastian Bach (page 117, Vol. I.) we read the following:-

"'The Wohltemperirte Klavier' was published by Kollmann, in London, in 1799, and was soon followed by the firms of Nägeli, at Zürich; Simrock, at Bonn; Künel (now Peters), and Breitkopf and Härtel, in Leipzig." Similar information, under Kollmann's name, is to be found in Mendel's "Musikalisches Conversations-Lexikon" (page 122, Vol. VI.)

If these positive statements were correct, we should be able to claim for England the honour of having been the first to publish and make available for general use that indispensable text-book for musicians, the "Forty-eight Preludes and Fugues," generally known under the title of "The Well Tempered Clavier." The belief that such was really the case has become so general that I have frequently had enquiries from eminent musicians whether I could refer them to a copy of Kollmann's publication, under the above title, but never having seen or heard of one, notwithstanding diligent search, I became sceptical as to the accuracy of the commonly accepted story. My doubt was increased by failing to find any mention of the book in various lists of Kollmann's published works.

Until a recent period this presumptive negative evidence was all I could adduce, but a fortunate late acquisition for my library now enables me to set the

In the "Quarterly Musical Register," published January, 1812, a work edited by Kollmann, there is an interesting article with the heading "Of John Sebastian Bach and his works," from which I extract the following :-

"One circumstance, which operated most surprisingly in favour of all the works of Sebastian Bach, and which ought not to remain unknown, is Mr. Kollmann's announcing, in chapter xi., p. 21, of the said Essay, an analyzed edition of the Well Temper'd Clavier,' one of which he inserted as a specimen, for this was immediately noticed in the Allege-meine Mus. Zeitung, of Leipzig, Vol. II., No. 1, for October 2, 1799, thus: England is not unac-quainted with the state of music in Germany. Even those higher departments of German art, in which we ourselves begin to be strangers, are so well known there, that an English organist can have the courage of publishing Sebastian Bach's 'Well Temper'd Clavier, with Explanations'; when but a few years ago an attempt of printing that work was made in vain, at two different places, in that great composer's own country.' created so great an emulation that the said work, which had never been printed before, appeared in print about a year after, at three different places-viz., at Zurich, Bonn, and Leipzig; and it has since been printed at several other places.

"But as numerous copies of the three first editions were imported in England, it made Mr. Kollmann relinquish his intended edition, and attempt those twelve Analyzed Fugues of his own, which he has lately published. However, Messrs. S. Wesley and Horn are now publishing those Preludes and Fugues, with explanations, in four numbers, three of which are already printed, and will be noticed in our

The above important extract satisfactorily establishes two matters which have hitherto been uncertain, namely, in the first place, Kollmann never published an edition of the "Well Temper'd Clavier"; first place, her talent as a pianist is most extraordinary: and, secondly, Wesley and Horn printed their edition in 1811-12.

PRECOCIOUS TALENT.

THE main thesis of this paper-that precocious talent is a dangerous gift, and so, far from being unduly encouraged and artificially stimulated, should be artificially retarded-is one which in the abstract few persons will be found to controvert. And yet how seldom parents have the good sense to refrain from exhibiting and "exploiting" their prodigies, or from over-cultivating any abnormal intellectual or artistic activity on the part of their children! How few teachers are there conscientious and considerate enough to repress the suicidal enthusiasm with which these highly gifted natures fling themselves into their studies! It is such a welcome rarity amid a host of mediocrities to encounter one such pupil that the master is often unintentionally or intentionally blind to the expenditure of vitality at which progress is made. The annals of music abound in instances of these child virtuosi, whose brilliant early promise was either abruptly blighted by jealous fate—as though to exemplify the Pagan proverb "Those whom the gods love die young "-or else remained unfruitful and abortive. Even in the case of those who achieved lasting fame, it is more than probable that the prodigiously rapid development of their genius in early childhood was in part at least the cause of their early decay, a penalty invariably paid when the balance of mental and physical exertion is too rudely disturbed. On the other hand, the world has probably been the gainer in the long run for the obstacles, which in the case of some of the great composers, hampered the free play of their talents at the outset. And, further, the widest and most comprehensive genius is not unfrequently that which ripens most slowly, and which has escaped the notice of relations and teachers in the early stages of its development. An examination of the careers of the really great men of the world will reveal the fact that a large proportion amongst them were inclined to take life very easily in their youth, when their faculties were expanding. One of our really great administrators, Lord Lawrence, a man of whom all the English speaking races ought to be proud, was accounted an idle fellow enough when at school; in other words, he made no untimely inroads upon the vivida vis, which in after years enabled him to get through such pro-digious quantities of work. We do not go so far as to encourage young musicians to be idle, but we profess no sympathy for the practice of giving infant musical prodigies opportunities for the public display of their talents. It subjects them to undue excitement and strain, and it is to be condemned as strongly as the more recent practice of allowing boys to figure at lawn-tennis tournaments, and to discount the vigour of their manhood by encountering grown-up competitors. Our feeling in the presence of these enfants terribles, musical or otherwise, is a mixed emotion in which alarm predominates. We have no intention of inflicting on our readers a chronicle of the musical prodigies who have from time to time flashed forth on the musical firmament only to suffer sudden and total eclipse, or at best to relapse into dim obscurity. would be rather a depressing task. But there are some admirably appropriate remarks of Berlioz, which we shall offer no apology for transcribing. On the occasion of a visit to Hanover, where Antoine Bohrer was Kapellmeister, some forty-five years back, he came across the latter's daughter, Sophie Bohrer, first place, her talent as a pianist is most extraordinary; besides which, her memory is such that in the concerts she gave last year in Vienna, her father, instead of a programme, printed a list of seventy-two piecessonatas, concertos, fantasias, fugues, variations, études, by Beethoven, Weber, Cramer, Bach, Handel, Liszt, Thalberg, Chopin, &c., which she knew by heart, and could, without hesitation, play from memory just as the assembly might desire. It is enough for her to play over a piece three or four times, no matter how long or complicated, never to forget it. To think of so many combinations of different kinds engraving themselves thus in this young brain! Is there not something prodigious in it, and calculated to inspire as much terror as admiration?" Berlioz's sinister forebodings were unhappily only too well founded. This highly gifted girl, as we read in the "Biography of Fétis," who, had she lived, would have doubtless taken a foremost rank amongst the most celebrated artists, was struck down by a premature death some half-a-dozen years after Berlioz's

In music, as in the other arts, it will be found that the most enduring titles to immortality are those of the great masters "who were not born on the steps of the throne," but who had "to fight, to overcome, and to conquer, in order that they might reign." Initial facility is often the most fatal bar to ultimate success, by reason of the tendency it has to beget content-ment and stifle that "divine discontent" or progressive desire, which, as it separates man from the lower animals, is also to be found in its highest development in the greatest natures. Another danger of precocious executive talent is that it subjects the genius of its possessor to the tyranny of his instrument, generally the piano. On this head, again, Berlioz has written some golden words, which we respectfully commend to the consideration of English ballad-writers of the day. Berlioz's father would not let him learn the piano, and though the lack of this accomplishment lost him more than one appointment, and nearly landed him in a ridiculous strait in Moscow, it was amply compensated by the advantages he enumerates below: "When I consider the appalling number of platitudes, the production of which is facilitated by the piano-miserable platitudes, which nevertheless the majority of their authors could not write if they were deprived of their musical kaleidoscope, and had only pen and paper to rely upon-I cannot help feeling grateful to the chance which forced me to compose in silence and freedom, and thus emancipated me from the tyranny of the fingers, so dangerous to the intellect, and from the seductive influence always exercised, more or less, on a composer by the sound of commonplaces." It is greatly to be feared that the divine afflatus only comes upon some of our minstrels when they are seated on their tripod-the music-stool-and have full command of their kaleidoscope. A good instance of the domination of the piano was furnished us the other day by an able violinist, who assured us that in the writings for the violin of many contemporary composers, the more elaborate passages were obviously constructed from the standpoint of the pianist, and not the violinist. While then, as we have seen, nature resents, and often in tragic fashion, the undue strain on the physical and mental organisation involved in the efforts of unfledged genius, reason and common sense refuse to admit the possibility of completeness or adequacy in the interpretations of great works by child artists. How is a child to express the virile strength and pathos and tragedy of Beethoven? To do this a "a charming child of twelve, whose marvellous organi- performer must be a tragic artist and able to fulfil the main aim of tragedy, namely, "the refinement of the souls of the hearers by the means of pity and terror," for no one has yet improved upon Aristotle's definition. Such performances cannot claim to be more satisfactory than recitations of Shakespeare by children; and one instinctively reverts to the historic instance of the luckless Master Betty, whose dramatic career was a long anti-climax from a misplaced zenith. Musical prodigies come and go from time to time, but of their subsequent fate we seldom hear. The sequel is too often a tragic breakdown, sometimes a lapse into the ranks of the army they aspired to lead; pathos, in fact, or bathos. What seemed to be genius has occasionally turned out to be only a parrot-like faculty of assimilation, aided by industry and supple fingers.

It is, we think, somewhere in the charming memoirs of Moscheles that we have read of some such executant, whose mechanism excited great wonder until it was discovered that he could only play half-a-dozen pieces and hardly read at all. The ultimate fate of such impostors, we need hardly add, is generally of the bathetic order.

A great executant, then, to summarise, must be of a highly-strung, enthusiastic temperament, for an excess of phlegm is a fatal bar to an artist, though highly conducive to longevity. He must be more or less of an actor, and like a good actor must be able to keep the true balance between intellect and emotion in his renderings. Should such a combination of qualities be found in a child, we should naturally feel alarm lest the intellect should wear out the body before the latter had time to grow up to it. Where such a combination does not exist, performances of important works by children may excite the curiosity, but they cannot satisfy the intellect or stir any emotion save that of pity.

Holding these convictions, commonplace and selfevident enough in all conscience, it was perhaps in a partial and prejudiced mood that we recently witnessed a performance of the "Pirates of Penzance" by a company of children, at the Savoy Theatre. At all events, our convictions were only confirmed by what we saw and heard, and we feel that we should be failing in our duty if we did not record our belief that the London public, by countenancing such performances, lends its sanction to, and becomes responsible for, the musical and dramatic overpressure involved in the preparation of these and similar entertainments. Let us at once, and unhesitatingly, admit that we were, in parts at least, much amused and diverted; for, to our way of thinking, Mr. Gilbert's naïve cynicism loses much of its incongruity and hollowness when delivered by children. Let us not fail also to express our respect for the indomitable, though misdirected, patience of the musical and theatrical drillmasters, who have co-operated to produce this phenomenal result. For phenomenal it is, and there is the mischief of it. The performances of children at pantomimes are open to criticism, but even if they are defensible no analogy holds good in this case. For here, to the physical strain and excitement must be superadded, in the case of the leading performers, the serious tax on the brain entailed in the mastering of music and words. Perhaps we are unduly alarmist in our views. At any rate, we do not stand alone in holding them, or in considering that the public is gravely culpable in encouraging a system, the wholesale adoption of which may lead to a new massacre of the innocents. In a couple of cases there were unmistakable symptoms of fatigue; the voices of the soloists were faulty in intonation, unsteady, and lacking in youthful freshness. The girl who played the part of Mabel struck us as anæmic squeaks with which the waltz song are embellished were delivered in a faded tuneless voice that it was positively painful to listen to. But if Mabel distressed, the Lilliputian major-general alarmed us by his unearthly sang-froid. The only character from whom we derived unalloyed pleasure was the sergeant of police, a boy who has the makings of a true comedian in him if he is not improved off the face of the earth by this unfortunate system of discounting talent. It is a notorious fact, so well known as hardly to need repetition here, save as an illustration of our argument, that the most brilliant school and university successes, where they have not resulted in a complete breakdown, have not unfrequently been followed by uneventful careers. Precocious talent is like hothouse fruit, it lacks the hardiness and aroma of products grown more slowly and under normal conditions. We should be only too glad to learn that our gloomy auguries are absolutely unfounded, and that all the members of the company have enjoyed, and continue to enjoy, the most robust health. We admit frankly that some of the troupe seemed to enjoy their parts thoroughly. But when even grownup persons do not always know what is good for them, much less can children be expected to do so—even the gifted children of Mr. D'Oyly Carte's company. The decision of this question rests entirely with the public. If audiences are not merely content to be amused, but resolve to examine the means by which that amusement has been produced, and the physical results of these means upon the performers, and on finding the one and the other illegitimate and hurtful, discourage such performances, the abuse, if it exists, will abate, and clever children will be debarred from one more avenue to premature fame and untimely collapse.

THE Lower House of the Convocation of Canterbury was occupied for a short time during its late Session with the subject of the reform and improvement of church singing. In spite of the prevalence of choral service, there are many who object to it because they prefer a less ornate form of worship, and more who find it distasteful, not unjustly, on account of the manner in which it is performed. The word "performed" suggests one main cause of the dislike and distrust with which many thoughtful and reverent churchmen regard choral service. By those who conduct it, as well as by those who hear it, it is too often looked upon as a mere "performance," a professional engagement fulfilled by those who make music their business, and to be judged of accordingly. Skilful and devout chanting and intoning can be at once an incentive and a vehicle of true worship, but when "art" is either wholly and lamentably absent, or, being present, makes itself too prominent, the worthier part of a congregation are tempted to wish themselves or their ministering brethren elsewhere. The recommendations of the Committee of Convocation are thoroughly practical, and should be well within the range of possibility. For it is not too much to ask that the children in Elementary Schools should be taught to sing at sight, and that some further attention to the theory and practice of music should be given by the students in training colleges, who will often have to train and accompany village choirs. It is especially requisite that some time should be spent on this acquirement by candidates for holy orders, although, of course, it would be ludicrous and mischievous to make proficiency in music an absolute test or condition of fitness for ordination. Much more, however, we are convinced, can be done in this direction than has hitherto been attempted or deemed necessary, and listless, and the fioriture and little staccato and we should be pleased indeed to see the recomfor holy orders, issue in some new effort, at the Universities and the Theological Colleges, to make the practice of music, especially of intoning, a definite part of a clergyman's training. And, indeed, where there is little or no aptitude for music, these recommendations might, we think, be made to bear fruit in some official provision on the part of teaching bodies for instruction in good and effective reading. By effective reading we do not mean a stagey style of delivery, but a style which is simple, intelligent, grave, serious; in a word, suited to the place and the subject. We could say a good deal on the matter of reading and intoning, to the badness of both of which much of the inattention complained of in our congregations is undoubtedly due, but remarks such as we should like to make are more suitable to the lecture room than the columns of a musical journal. We reiterate the hope that these valuable recommendations may result in some well considered and sustained effort to improve church singing, and not be left to lie by on dusty shelves with many other much needed schemes of reform.

A Correspondence in a Lancaster newspaper respecting the "Profaneness of the Oratorio" has called up some highly instructive and original remarks upon the subject, which we regret being unable to find space for. Handel seems to have been the principal person attacked, the repetition of the words "For unto us a child is born," in the great chorus of "The Messiah," which every musician regards as so strikingly characteristic of the exultation of the people, being dwelt upon by one writer as a serious mistake of the composer. Readers of the Spectator must remember the letter from a lady who calls attention to the severely critical remarks of her friend, which she owns to having stored up under the heading "Mr. Froth's opinion of Milton"; and we do not wonder, therefore, that there are "Froths" in music who can excite the admiration of a narrow circle of admirers by professing to have discovered some flaws in the works of Handel. But the following passage, on the construction of Oratorio itself, is too good to be lost. "I never presumed to sit in judgment on the musical genius of Handel. I say that in dramatising the words of holy writ his genius was misapplied. Suppose that a thief were to find his way into a warehouse—say number 34, or any other number-Erskine Street, or any other street in Liverpool, or any other city, and successfully pick a double patent safe-Chubb or Milner. The prosecutor would not deny the man's genius. Probably the judge, in passing sentence, would remark sorrowfully that it was a pity so much skill should be mis-applied." The author of this extraordinary paragraph should not remain unknown to our readers— his name is Thomas Johnson; and, from what we can gather from his letter, we believe that he is a professor of music. The editor of the paper in which this appears, says, "Enough has now been said on 'The profaneness of the Messiah." Too much, we would add. Mr. Johnson may have skill in teaching music, but in writing upon it a "judge" would unquestionably affirm that his skill has been "misapplied.'

THE Fifth Annual Report of the Birmingham Musical Association affords so convincing a proof of the real love for the art amongst the working classes that we cannot but believe such an excellent example well worthy of imitation in other large and important mendations of the Committee, as regards candidates G. H. Johnstone and Mr. Henry Hendriks, in the tively, may be difficult to secure; but the experiment is one which cannot but be productive of good results to the employers, as well as to the employed; and we are certain, therefore, that many persons of position and influence would easily be found to lend their earnest aid to the cause. The Report tells us that the average attendance at the Saturday evening concerts, at which the band and chorus have both assisted, has been 2,645; much of the success of the performances being due to the assiduity of the Conductor, Mr. C. J. Stevens. The following works have been performed in their entirety during the season: Mendelssohn's "Elijah," "Hear my Prayer,"

"Loreley," 98th Psalm, "Ave Maria," and "As the Hart pants," Spohr's "God, Thou art Great," Gaul's Sacred Cantata, "The Holy City," and C.J. Stevens's Anthem "Sing, O Heavens," selections having been "The Seasons," "St. Paul," "Samson," and the "Song of Miriam." We may also say that the programme of the Ballad Concert forwarded to us with the Report is an excellent example of what popular entertainments of this class should be; and in recommending music-lovers in other towns, therefore, to organise an Association on the admirable model of that at Birmingham, we must also urge the necessity of exercising the utmost care and attention upon the selection of the compositions to be performed.

> A LITTLE pamphlet recently forwarded to us entitled "Choirs and Choral Singing," by a Chorister, proves that an earnest desire to promote a higher view of the duties of a church choir is rapidly spreading, not only amongst those who form the congregation, but amongst those who form the choir. The effect of careless and slovenly singing in a sacred edifice is doubtless apparent to the listeners; but no persons can better divine the causes of this than those who belong to the choral body itself, and if the plain speaking in the pamphlet to which we have referred do not cause jealousy, it will certainly aid in instituting reform. The author of this intelligent and temperate address truly says that the candidate, having passed the ordinary rudimentary examination, "cannot possibly in any practical, far less musical, sense, become a chorister thereby; he is on the threshold, but the date at which he may assume to himself this title depends entirely upon his adherence to rules which he should lay down for himself, such as regularity of attendance, punctuality, entire selfabnegation; to decline and discountenance all unnecessary talking; to make himself master of the words and cues; to be on the watch for the conductor's sign to rise, which is a great test of the attention of a chorus, who would then rise as one body without the noise and shuffling that are so common." Excellent rules are afterwards given for singing not only with the "spirit" but with the "understanding" of the words; and these hints are doubly valuable as being the result of years of practical experience as a chorister. In our last number we gave the impressions of a lover of sacred music "At a Choir Practice"; for the many evils he complained of we have in this pamphlet, published at Norwich, some sensible suggestions as to the remedies.

WHEN, many years ago, the establishment of Reading-rooms for the working classes, and cheap periodicals, gave unmistakable evidence of the desire to widen the circle which embraced the "reading public," it towns. True it is that so energetic a President as became the custom with certain persons to cast Mr. Jesse Collings, or such able assistants as Mr. ridicule upon those who aspired to a higher intellectual position than they had been accustomed to; and amongst the rest of the satires which then appeared we distinctly remember a song called "The Literary Dustman," the title of which sufficiently explains its object. Since that time, however, not only "dustmen," but many other hard-working members of the community have availed themselves of the solace of literature after their day of toil, without being laughed at; and now we find, by a Welsh newspaper, that the colliers of Pontypridd are beginning to devote their Saturday evenings to the study of the pianoforte, under a competent teacher. Let us hope that instead of making capital out of this fact by the publication of a song called "The Musical Miner," we may benefit by past experience, and aid these men in the endeavour to substitute the pleasure of music for that to be found at the public-house. It is not likely that Pontypridd will produce a pianist who shall elicit enthusiastic applause at St. James's Hall; but he may at least gratify himself, and set a good example to those around him. The most effectual method of weaning a man from unhealthy excitement is to attract him to a healthy one; and experience has proved that the eloquence of music is far beyond that of the most earnest lecturer on temperance.

AT Burton-upon-Trent, we are informed, Madame Marie Roze and some members of the Opera Company have taken part in a representation of "Il Trovatore," before the employes of Messrs. Bass, the opera being given in the large branding shed of the brewery on a stage constructed on beer barrels. This is certainly a step in the right direction, but does it not savour a little too much of the "brewery"? There can be really no greater reason for performing upon the top of beer-barrels on this occasion than for singing on a steam-engine at a Concert for the servants of a railway, and starting the programme with a shrill screech from the whistle.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL CHORAL SOCIETY.

THE announcement that this important Society would perform Mr. Mackenzie's masterpiece, "The Rose of Sharon," was received with much gratification by all classes of musicians. The work was not included in the prospectus of the season, but whatever change in the arrangements was involved by devoting one of the Sub-scription Concerts to the new Oratorio was fully justified under the circumstances. There was further cause for congratulation because the London public had not yet had an opportunity of hearing it to the best advantage, and a worthy interpretation was looked for with confidence from Mr. Barnby's well-trained forces. The Oratorio performances under his direction are generally unsurpassable, and it was felt that the utmost pains would be taken to render justice to the work of a distinguished British composer. Without doubt, therefore, the audience on the 4th ult. assembled with high expectations; and it is not too much to say that they separated with feelings of disappointment and vexation. Several causes contributed to bring about this untoward result, principals, orchestra, and chorus being alike below the standard customarily observed by the Albert Hall Choral Society. It is painful to be compelled to write thus in connection with an occasion of so much interest, but no good object would be served by concealing the facts. To begin with, the Society was unfortunate in its choice of a soprano for the interpretation of the leading part. Miss Griswold has proved herself a competent operatic artist, but vocal training in Paris is not conducive to efficiency in English Oratorio. The style of the American singer is essentially dramatic, and her method of voice production is distinctively French. It is, therefore, not in her power at present to give satisfaction in music requiring simplicity and purity of style, rather than theatrical airs and graces. In justice however to her it must be remembered that she was singing for the first Mozart's Adagio in E for violin and orchestra, the solo time in the Albert Hall-in itself no slight ordeal-and she was evidently suffering in no small degree from nershe was evidently sunering in no shart degree from het-vousness. Miss Hilda Wilson's rendering of the contratto music was absolutely perfect. The breadth and dignity she infused into the fine prologue, and the beautiful air "Lo, the king greatly desireth," secured for these numbers the heartiest applause of the evening. A highly favourable impression was also made by Mr. Watkin Mills in the airs allotted to Solomon, and this remarkably promising young artist may be said to have advanced his position by so capably interpreting music by no means easy. Mr. Barton McGuckin served a good apprenticeship in Oratorio before he adopted the lyric stage, and he was thoroughly artistic in the part of the Beloved. In criticising the choir some allowance may be made for the difficulties of the work. But it is the first time for several years that such allowance has had to be made for the force under Mr. Barnby's control. If we are rightly informed, there had been eight rehearsals of the work, and had the usual pains been taken an ideal performance should have resulted. But not only was the body of tone less powerful than usual, but some of the entries were missed in a most unaccountable manner. The tenors made no sign when they should have recommenced the opening chorus after the soprano and tenor duet, and the organ did duty for the ladies when they should have reiterated their query "Art thou so simple?" at the close of the second part. Another unfortunate breakdown occurred in the corno inglese part in the Air "Rise up, my love!" Over and above the actual errors there was a singular sense of tameness in the general performance. Much of it was blurred, feeble, and curiously unimpressive. In consequence of these deplorable circumstances many of the transcendent beauties of "The Rose of Sharon" could not have been recognised by those who heard the work for the first time, and for the sake of its reputation the Society should give another performance at the earliest opportunity.

Ample proof was given that the Society's forces have not really deteriorated by the performance of "The Messiah" on Ash Wednesday, the 18th ult.; and one is forced to the wretched conclusion that the masterpiece of an English composer was not deemed of sufficient importance to warrant any trouble being taken in its The choir in Handel's work was in its best preparation. form, and of the soloists ample satisfaction was given by Miss Anna Williams, Madame Patey, and Mr. Santley. Mr. Charles Wade sang the quieter portions of the tenor music artistically, but he was altogether overweighted in "Thou shalt break them."

CRYSTAL PALACE.

THE first of the Saturday Concerts after the usual interval at Christmas was given on the 14th ult. Mr. Manns on taking his place at his desk received an ovation the warmth of which testified to the appreciation in which his services are held by the frequenters of the Crystal Palace Concerts. The first piece in the programme was a new Concert-overture, "Richard I.," by Mr. Claudius H. Couldery. This gentleman, who had not previously obtained a hearing at the Saturday Concerts, studied at the Royal Academy of Music, where he was a pupil of Sir Sterndale Bennett in composition. The traces of his master's influence are to be seen rather in the clearness of his forms than in the character of his themes. The overture is a meritorious rather than a striking work. It consists of an introductory Andante in F major, somewhat in the style of a choral, and a brilliant Allegro Vivace in F minor, well constructed, but rather wanting in distinctive character, especially as regards its first subject. The treatment from a technical point of view is good and musicianly, though the instrumentation shows occasional signs of inexperience. Why the overture should have received its present title is a puzzle which we are unable to solve. The name of the first Richard would seem to suggest either a martial character in the music or some reference to the episode of the captive monarch and Blondel; but we fail to find in the present case any con-nection between the subject and the musical illustration.

part well played by Mr. Carl Jung, was another novelty at Sydenham. It proved to be of no special interest, being written in what we may call Mozart's "everyday" manner. It is, like most of the composer's slow movements, pleasing; but it is not one of his best. Concerning such familiar pieces as Beethoven's symphony in D, and Mendelssohn's overture to the "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage," it is needless to say a word beyond the record of a fine performance. Madame Essipoff played Beethoven's.concerto in E flat in her best manner, subsequently contributing solos by Chopin and Saint-Saëns, and Mdlle. Anna Soubré, from the French opera, who appeared for the first time at these concerts, made a favourable impression in songs by Massenet and De Grandval.

The chief interest of the concert on the 21st centred in the first performance at the Crystal Palace of Raff's posthumous Symphony in A minor, No. 11, bearing the title "Winter." This work completes a series of four symphonies, written as musical illustrations of the four seasons, of which the other three had already been heard at these Concerts. That the work brought forward on Saturday had not received the composer's finishing touches is probable from the fact stated on the title page of the published score, that it has been "revised and edited by Max Erdmannsdörfer." Whether the revision and editing amounted to anything more than seeing the proof-sheets through the press, we are unable to say. Like the large majority of Raff's symphonies, the "Winter" is "programme music"-at least as regards three of its four movements. The opening Allegro is entitled "Der erste Schnee" (the first snow), but the connection between the title and the music is by no means obvious. It is clear that no actual picture of a fall of snow is intended, though Haydn in a quaintly descriptive recitative in the "Creation" has attempted to depict "the light and flaky snow." Raff deals rather with impressions; though what these are must be left to each hearer to determine for himself. It goes without saying that the music is excessively clever; but it suffers from the great fault so frequently to be found in the composer's works, over-elaboration. This first movement occupies a quarter of an hour in performance; and the ideas are not of sufficient importance to bear such lengthened treatment. The second movement, which bears no inscription, is in our opinion the most successful portion of the symphony. It is a kind of inter-mezzo, commencing with a theme in the rhythm of a gavotte, varied in a very ingenious and interesting manner. The variations are, however, abandoned as the music proceeds, and new matter is introduced bearing but a distant connection with what has gone before. As the opening subject does not recur in its entirety, a want of unity is thus produced; but in spite of this defect, as it seems to us, the piece is extremely effective. The slow movement, "Am Camin" (By the Fireside), is very melodious, but far too much spun out; and the same may be said of the finale, entitled "Carneval," which is full of bustle and spirit, and contains an infinity of ingenious contrapuntal devices. The symphony as a whole is representative both of the strong and weak points of the composer. We find in it all his flow of easy and natural, if sometimes commonplace, melody, all his skill in development and brilliance of instrumentation; but we also find the diffuseness which is seldom wholly absent from his larger works, and a certain dryness in the workmanship which is not compensated by any great interest in the ideas. We think the work will neither add to nor take from Raff's reputa-The remainder of the concert may be briefly dismissed. Mr. Max Pauer gave an excellent and musicianly rendering of Mendelssohn's concerto in D minor; the orchestra played the overtures to "Egmont" and the "Carnaval Romain" (Berlioz); and Mdlle. Lido was the vocalist of the afternoon.

MONDAY AND SATURDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

THESE entertainments pursue the even tenour of their way, undisturbed by any changes of fashion and safe from the caprice which brings prosperity one day and disaster the next. There has been singularly little during the past month save routine work, and not one feature which will cause the season to be especially remembered. Even on Saturday, January 31, the anniversary of Schubert's birth, it was only deemed advisable to devote half the programme to the works of the richly endowed composer. An entire Schubert Concert would assuredly not have proved fatiguing to the audience. The only representative work presented, however, was the magnificent Quintet in C, Op. 163, as absolute a masterpiece as ever proceeded from the pen of a musician. Mr. Max Pauer might have played one of the Sonatas, which are too seldom heard, instead of two of the Impromptus; they are charming trifles certainly, but every student of the pianoforte knows them by heart. Mr. Lloyd sang one of the Lieder in his best style. The second part of the Concert included Tartini's violin Sonata in A minor, and Beethoven's Trio in G, Op. 1, No. 2.

The programme of Monday, the 2nd ult., was one of the best of the season, though it did not include any novelty. Modern art was represented by two very fine works, Schumann's Trio in D minor, Op. 63, and Brahms's Sextet in G, Op. 36. The last named is one of those creations of genius which gain by repetition. The beautiful first movement, one of the composer's purest inspirations, pleases at once, but familiarity is needed for the appreciation of the irregularly constructed Poco adagio, and the discursive finale. The Quintet was splendidly interpreted under Madame Néruda's leadership, and very warmly received. Miss Zimmermann introduced for the first time a Fantasia con Fuga in D of Bach, which musicians will recognise by the fugue subject in triplet semiquavers. The Concert concluded with Schubert's Rondo in B minor for pianoforte and violin, Op. 70. Mr. Thorndike, the vocalist of the evening, deserves praise for his artistic delivery of Handel's air "Tyrannic Love." On the following Saturday the programme was popular in every sense of the word, but for that reason scarcely requires criticism. It included Mendelssohn's Quartet in E flat, Op. 12; Beethoven's Serenade Trio in D, Op. 8; his Sonata in C, Op. 2, No. 3 (beautifully played by Miss Zimmermann); and Handel's Violin Sonata in D. Mrs. Hutchinson sang with much taste Mozart's "Deh vieni," and a song by Miss Maude White. The Concert of Monday, the 9th, may be dismissed with almost equal brevity, as it is quite impossible to say anything about was popular in every sense of the word, but for that reason brevity, as it is equite impossible to say anything about such works as Beethoven's Quartet in B flat, Op. 18, No. 6, or Schumann's Quartet in E flat, Op. 47. Madame Néruda and Herr Straus repeated Mozart's Duet in B flat for violin and viola, this being the last appearance but one of Madame Norman-Néruda for the present season. Beethoven's Six Variations on an original air in F received a very refined interpretation from Madame Haas, a pianist highly acceptable in music requiring delicacy and purity of style rather than masculine force and vigour. Those agreeable duettists, Miss Louise Phillips and Madame Fassett, contributed four items by Holländer and Mary Carmichael, the two duets by the lady composer, "A poor soul sat sighing" and "Who is Sylvia," being especially well received.

It is not often that a Saturday audience has the privilege welcoming Herr Joachim on his return to England. This, however, was accorded on the 14th ult., and it need scarcely be said that St. James's Hall was crammed to its utmost extent, scores of people standing in the gangways, while others were refused admission. The great violinist speedily gave proof that his powers have in no way diminished. He led Mendelssohn's splendid Quartet in E minor, Op. 44, No. 2, in masterly style, and gave a beautifully finished rendering of a Recitative and Adagio from Spohr's Concerto in G minor, No. 6, with pianoforte accompaniment arranged by F. Hermann. Mr. Max Pauer introduced for the first time Schumann's Allegro in B minor, Op. 8. Everything left by the great representative of modern German music should be accorded a hearing, but it is impossible that the present work should ever become a favourite with pianists. It is clever and of course original, but laboured and for the most part uninteresting. Wasielewski declares that it belongs to "Schumann's feeblest mental productivity. It is unrefreshing in its broad irregular proproductivity. It is difficult on for sympathy in its lack of all power and purity of expression." This is, perhaps, unduly severe. Mr. Max Pauer played fairly well, but without any striking individuality of style. That rising young Mozart's Trio in E, No. 6. On the following Monday, the attendance was unusually scanty, a circumstance attributable to the bad weather, as the programme was by no means wanting in attractiveness. The concerted works were Beethoven's third Rasoumowski Quartet in C, Op. 59, and Schumann's Phantasiestücke for piano, violin, and violoncello, Op. 88, a series of four movements originally designed as a trio, but afterwards re-named, perhaps on account of their sketchiness, and the absence of regular development, Herr Joachim gave Bach's Chaconne, his grand rendering of which is too well known to need description, Miss Agnes Zimmermann played Schubert's Impromptu in C minor, Op. 90, and a selection of the Valses Nobles, Op. 77, and Miss Thudichum contributed songs by Purcell and Cowen. Two masterpieces of Beethoven were included in the programme of Saturday, the 21st-namely, the Quintet in C, Op. 29, and the Trio in D, Op. 70, No. 1. It would be nothing short of an impertinence to criticise works so justly famous as these. Herr Joachim made a curious choice of solos—namely, arrangements of Nos. 3 and 9 of Schumann's four-hand pieces "für kleine und grosse Kinder," Op. 85, by Ernst Rudorff. Whether this kind of thing is permissible is open to question; but the audience settled the matter in the affirmative by encoring the performer. Miss Zimmermann gave Mendelssohn's familiar Caprice in E, Op. 33, and Mr. Santley sang two equally familiar airs by Handel.

A capital programme on the 23rd drew a full audience, the general public being attracted by Beethoven's Rasou-mowski Quartet in F, No. 1, and Tartini's "Trillo del Diavolo," and musicians by Grieg's Sonata in F, for piano Diavolo," and musicians by Grieg's Sonata in F, for piano and violin, Op. 8. The last-named charming work had only been given once previously, and that was ten years ago. There is an easy flow of spontaneous melody in each of its three movements, coupled with a strong infusion of Scandinavian feeling, which in itself is pleasing. Mr. Max Pauer gave an acceptable rendering of Schumann's Novelletten, Nos. 3 and 8, and may be further commended for declining an encore. We venture to think, however, that pianists are too prone at present to content themselves with trifles such as these. Beethoven is still drawn upon from time to time, but we never hear any of the fine Sonatas of Schubert, not to mention those of Weber or Dussek. Without desiring to grumble unduly, it must further be said that the bi-centenary of Handel deserved more recognition than was given by the selection of the air "Tell fair Irene," by Mr. Maas. Surely on such an occasion one or two of the rarely-heard Suites or other instrumental works might have been revived.

THE BACH CHOIR.

THIS Society gave its twenty-second public Concert in St. James's Hall on the 19th ult., and asserted alike the catholicity of its taste and the wide range of its operations by performing two modern works of totally opposite character, with the Pastoral Symphony from Bach's "Christmas Oratorio" thrown in. It might naturally be asked what the old master had to do in such company; but, we believe, the Bach Choir aims, on all public occasions, to keep up a connection with him, if only by a thread. Here there was a special reason to boot-namely, the resuscitation and rehabilitation of the oboe d'amore, an instrument for which Bach was fond of writing. There are two parts for it in the Pastoral Symphony, and these were played on oboid'amore by Messrs. Horton and Lebon. The effect was quaint and pleasing enough to justify the spirit of truth which led to the revival of the old-fashioned pipe. Of the two modern works, Mr. Hubert Parry's music to Scenes from Shelley's "Prometheus Unbound" held the place of honour. This composition was first produced at the Gloucester Festival of 1880, and was then dealt with by our Special Correspondent in a manner fully deserved. We shall enter upon no new criticism here, but content ourselves with quoting a passage from our Special Correspondent's letter, every word of which remains true:—
"Mr. Parry's composition had not advanced very far before we discovered that he was an ardent admirer of the 'music of the future' and resolved to show us how he read Shelley's fine poetry by the light of his musical theory. Knowing this, we were of course not astonished to find that in the declahis work, the words are set with such a total disregard of the effect of the music upon the hearer, as almost to make us believe that the composer had ignored the necessity of such consideration altogether. True it is that there is much power evidenced in the orchestral colouring, and that in many parts we have detached phrases of real beauty; but these are very few and very far between, and the dulness which gradually spread itself over the large audience was made even more apparent by these transient gleams of light. As a rule, the orchestration is oppressively heavy, and in the early part of the work the choir is kept at such a constant strain that the hearer almost sighs for relief. We cannot but believe that had the composer been less fettered by the school to which he has wedded himself his real poetical feeling would have been more constantly evidenced, especially in the solos, some of which contain snatches of pure melody, which seem to have strayed in by accident, and been incautiously allowed to remain." We quote our We quote our Correspondent's courteous but severe criticism the more readily because never was judgment given on first hearing more completely borne out by after experience. The performance of the work in St. James's Hall, under Mr. Otto Goldschmidt, had many good points, and Mr. Parry found no small part of a friendly audience willing to bestow applause. The solos were sung by Mrs. Hutchinson, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. E. Lloyd, and Mr. Brereton. Kiel's short Oratorio, "The Star of Bethlehem," which was the applause. second novelty, had one thing in common with "Prometheus Unbound": it illustrated the fact that a composer can reproduce forms of music much more easily than he can animate them with their spirit. We shall not offer a detailed criticism of the Oratorio. Probably it will never again be heard in this country. We will point out, however, that Kiel presents an abundance of counterpoint, including a liberal allowance of fugue, and writes generally in an orthodox manner. Unfortunately this is not enough. We want life and moving power, such as genius knows how to infuse into even the most scholastic forms. Without such qualities the Oratorio was soon found to be very dull, and the audience rapidly left the hall, very few remaining at the end. The performance, even under these depressing circumstances, was good; and especially did Mrs. Hutchinson, Miss Wilson, and Mr. Lloyd do their best for the work.

THE HANDEL SOCIETY.

THE bi-centenary performances in honour of Handel and Bach have commenced, and this newly established Society had the honour of inaugurating them by the revival of "Saul," on the 21st ult., at St. James's Hall. Of all Handel's Oratorios "Saul" is one of the least known at the present day. We can find no record of any performance since 1852, when it was given by the Sacred Harmonic Society. That such neglect is undeserved will be admitted by musicians, though at the same time it is easily explainable. In 1738 Handel produced "Saul" and "Israel in Egypt." The former was successful while the latter was a failure, simply because "Saul" abounds in airs, while "Israel" consists chiefly of weighty choruses. During the interval Handelian aria has become old-fashioned, while the spell of his choral writing has vastly increased, and hence the reversal of the original verdict. Not that the score of "Saul" is destitute of grand choruses, but they are certainly fewer in number than in most of his oratorios. Two of them stand out from the rest as comparable with his finest efforts in other works. We refer of course to the sublime "Envy, eldest born of hell," and the grand and elaborate concluding number, "Gird on thy sword." But there are others well worthy of the master, such as the opening "How excellent Thy name," with its rich orches-tration, and the cleverly constructed "O fatal consequence" at the close of the second part. The airs are generally characterised by simplicity and a certain seriousness, not to say solemnity, of manner, rather than by elaboration of design; but they are chiefly remarkable as showing Han-del's feeling for dramatic truth even when adopting the square and formal pattern of his time. For example, the airs of the haughty Merab differ entirely in character from those allotted to the gentler Michal. Saul's songs are fierce and declamatory, while those of David are melodious matory passages which form a very considerable portion of and breathe the very spirit of piety. There is nothing more tender in all music than the couplets "O Lord, whose mercies," nor anything more pathetic than the lament, "In But perhaps the most remarkable feature of the work is the uncommon richness and variety of the orchestration. Why Handel, who in this instance employed many instruments-now universally considered necessary-with masterly effect, afterwards generally contented himself with strings, and at the most one or two wind instruments, will probably never be known. For a detailed description of the scoring in "Saul," we must refer our readers to Mr. Prout's interesting article in THE MUSICAL TIMES for May last year. Here it will be sufficient to say that in this case no justifiable plea could be advanced for additional accompaniments,

We must now turn to the performance, which was interesting as being the first on a large scale given by the Handel Society. From the book of words we learn that the Association is similarly organised and has similar objects to the Bach Choir and the London Musical Society. That is to say, it is formed for the practice of the highest class of music, and pecuniary gain does not form part of its aim. But it differs from the other bodies named in that it includes instrumental as well as vocal members. former at present number 53, of whom 48 play stringed instruments, and the latter 132. The Conductor is Mr. F. A. W. Docker, Organist of St. Andrew's, Wells Street. The idea seems to be to employ as little professional aid as possible, even at the public performances, for on this occasion the principal vocalists were amateurs. As an outcry has recently been heard respecting the danger to professional singers accruing from the increasing aggressiveness of the amateur, it may be said that, judging from this occasion, there is no cause for alarm. Mrs. Andrew Tuer possesses a contralto voice of beautiful quality, which she uses like an artist. Of the rest it will be sufficient to say that they doubtless did their best. The choruses were for the most part well rendered, but the voices were not evenly balanced, the contraltos and tenors being very weak. Great excisions were made in the work, including the whole of the part of Merab. That some curtailment was necessary will be admitted, and we will leave it an open question as to whether the cuts were judiciously made; but no difference of opinion can be entertained respecting the stoppage of the performance in order to play the National Anthem on the entrance of some members of the Royal Family. Anything in worse taste cannot be imagined. The largeness of the audience testified to the general interest in the revival, and the Society deserves the thanks of music lovers for its labours. At the same time, it may be affirmed that the work was not presented under conditions calculated to realise the full intentions of the composer.

MR. BACHE'S CONCERT.

THE annual Orchestral Concert of this earnest and enthusiastic disciple of Franz Liszt took place on the 5th ult., at St. James's Hall. There was a very numerous audience, whose presence was probably owing as much to their admiration of the indomitable zeal and perseverance of the concert-giver in affording a hearing in this country to the works of his revered master, as to the specific interest attaching to the works themselves. For some fourteen years past Mr. Walter Bache has been the recognised champion in England of that peculiar phase of the so-called "Music of the Future" represented by Liszt; and the fact that of late years some of the more important compositions by that master have been included likewise in the programmes of other Concert-institutions of the metropolis goes far to prove that his untiring efforts are at last meeting with a fair measure of success. Indeed, the most ambitious work performed on the present occasion (when the programme was, as usual, entirely Lisztian) had been previously produced, for the first time in this country, by Mr. Ganz, in 1882. We refer to the Symphony to Dante's "Divina Commedia," a species of programme-music to which, however, the conventional term of "Symphony" but inaptly applies. As in his "Symphonic Poems," the composer here discards entirely the recognised forms of the symphony proper, being guided in his inspiration solely by the exigencies of the poetic idea he desires to embody or to illustrate in his music. tation for careful performances of high class music.

Hence, in accordance with the great Florentine poet's world-epic, Liszt's musical paraphrase thereof is divided into three parts or movements, entitled respectively "Inferno," "Purgatorio," and "Paradiso"; the two former being purely orchestral, while in the latter a chorus of female voices is called into requisition, reminding one at once, though the connection may only be a superficial one, of the climax of both Beethoven's Ninth Symphony and that of Goethe's "Faust." The work in question having been already commented on in these columns, we may confine ourselves in the present instance to a hearty recognition of the admirable manner in which the orchestra acquitted itself of a most arduous task, and of the efficient rendering, on the part of the lady students of the Royal Academy of Music and members of Mr. Malcolm Lawson's St. Cecilia choir, of the final chorus-"Magnificat anima mea," wherein the melody of a Gregorian chant has been very effectively made use of, Bache's solo contribution to the programme was the pianoforte Concerto in E flat, which, as a matter of course, he played from memory—in itself a herculean effort—and which gained him prolonged and well-deserved applause. Other numbers were Liszt's arrangement of the famous-"Rakoczy" March, his "Priére aux anges gardiens," for stringed instruments, and the March from his Oratorio, "Christus," superscribed "Die heiligen drei Könige." Mdlle. Alice Barbi gave an excellent interpretation of the scène dramatique, "Jeanne d'Arc au bûcher." Mr. Dannreuther conducted the Concerto with conspicuous ability and in perfect sympathy with the principal performer; the remainder of the pieces having been conducted by the Concert-giver, who, there can be no doubt, has once more scored a distinct success for the cause he has at heart.

HIGHBURY PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

The second Concert of this Society's seventh season was given at the Athenæum, Highbury New Park, on Monday, the 2nd ult. Despite a very inclement evening. the audience was numerous and appreciative, and the performance, as a whole, was very successful. The first part of the programme consisted of "The Crusaders," by Niels W. Gade, which charming work was rendered both by orchestra and choir in a manner which evinced careful study and close attention. The leading parts were sustained by Miss Clara Samuell, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Frank Ward. Miss Samuell found ample scope for her sweet voice in the music of the part of Armida, the Enchantress, and Mr. Edward Lloyd was thoroughly himself in that of Rinaldo. The duet in the second part for Armida and Rinaldo, with a chorus of sirens, which is one of the finest numbers in the cantata, was beautifully rendered by Miss Samuell and Mr. Lloyd, and the ladies of the choir thoroughly well sustained the music allotted to the sirens. Mr. Frank Ward was vigorous and effective as Peter the Hermit. The orchestra executed the difficult passages with which the work abounds with skill and marked effect, the only exception being the incantation music in the second part, which was slightly marred by some of the instruments being a little out of tune. choir, as usual, was thoroughly efficient, and the rendering of the last number, especially, was in the best style.

The second part of the Concert consisted of a miscellaneous selection. The Overture to "Zampa" having been performed by the band, the "Spinning Chorus" from Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" was sung by the lady members of the choir in a manner hardly up to their usual scale of excellence. Mr. Gilbert H. Betjemann, the Assistant Conductor of the orchestra, then played a Nocturne by Chopin, arranged by Sarasate, and Spanish Dance, composed by the same accomplished violinist, for which he received well merited applause; and whomist, for which he received with merited apprause; and the Concert concluded with a selection from Gounod's "Faust," solos being given by Miss Samuell, Miss Florence Monk (a member of the Society), and Mr. Lloyd. The "Soldiers' Chorus" was given with great vigour by the tenors and basses of the Choir. Dr. J. F. Bridge conducted with his ways ability and precision and both he and the with his usual ability and precision, and both he and the Committee are to be congratulated upon the manner in which the Society has preserved and increased its repu-

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

ORCHESTRAL music is not often honoured in Birmingham by so large and enthusiastic a muster of votaries as that which signalised the third of the current series of Mr. Stockley's orchestral Concerts on the 5th ult.; but it was soon apparent from the manner in which the applause was distributed that instrumental art constituted for many of the audience quite a secondary feature of the entertainment, and that the chief attraction was to be found in the vocal accessories, and especially those which devolved upon Mr. Maas. Nevertheless, the orchestral selection was a more than usually interesting one, and as it had evidently been well rehearsed, the performance was not unworthy of the selection. First among the novelties should be named Raff's Italian Suite, "Im Süden," a posthumous work of the composer, evidently written before the "Lenore" Overture, though not produced till eleven or twelve years afterwards, in November, 1883. Two of the five movements of which it consists-viz., the Notturno and Tarantella-were heard at the Crystal Polace Concerts in March of last year, but Mr. Stockley, apparently, has been the first to present the Suite in its completeness to an English concert audience. The opening movement is brilliant and showy, but not otherwise remarkable; there is appropriate colour and movement in the barcarole, fun and frolic in the intermezzo entitled "Pulcinella," sensuous grace and poetry combined with exquisite instrumentation, in the Notturno, and abounding spirit and cumulative power in the finale Tarantella. The playing of these several movements was distinguished by technical finish of no mean order, combined with poetic insight and sympathy. Another novelty was a "Sevillana" by Mr. Elgar, a member of the orchestra, whose work exhibits a keen appreciation of the charms of Spanish dance rhythms, together with considerable skill-in parts, however, a little overwrought-in instrumental scoring. The Poëme Symphonique, which M. Saint-Saëns has entitled "Le rouet d'Omphale," had been heard here on a former occasion, but its characteristic graces and mannerisms were never presented in a more attractive guise than on this occasion. In Spohr's Dramatic Concerto (No. 8), for violin and orchestra, Mr. Carrodus gave a masterly rendering of the solo part, admirable alike in tone, feeling, and execution, and was vociferously applauded and recalled at its close. At a later period he afforded the audience another impressive exhibition of his virtuosity in Ernst's brilliant "Rondo Papageno." In the vocal department, Miss Clara Samuell won great applause by her execution of Rossini's "Non più mesta," and was not less successful in the vocal valse from Gounod's "Mireille"; but her most impressive performance was the melodious and touching "Farewell" of F. Edward Bache. Mr. Maas, although not in his best voice, greatly delighted the audience by his refined and fervid singing of "Dalla sua pace" and "Salve dimora." In Massenet's scena, "Apollo's Invocation," produced at the last Norwich Festival, his singing excited something like a furore among the audience, who recalled both him and Miss Samuell again and again. The conducting of Mr. Stockley throughout was marked by sound judgment and decision.

Encouraged by the results of their last Spring visit here, the Royal English Opera Company, of which Madame Blanche Cole, Madame Alice Barth, Mr. J. W. Turner, Mr. Geo. Fox, and Mr. Aynsley Cook are the leading members, commenced a twelve nights' season at the New Grand Theatre on the 9th, opening with the "Bohemian Girl." Unfortunately the prima donna of the Company has been for some time past in very uncertain health, and there were evidences of insufficient rehearsal or lax discipline in other of the leading artists. The opening performance consequently was a somewhat halting one; and the unfavourable impression produced upon the first night's audience seems to have militated against the success of the undertaking on other nights. Wallace's "Maritana," however, was very creditably rendered on the following evening, with Madame Clara Leslie and Mr. J. W. Turner as Maritana and Don Casar respectively. The "Crown it was changed at the eleventh hour for "Il Trovatore," owing to the indisposition of Madame Blanche Cole. the following evening the selection was "Fra Diavolo," and after that came "The Marriage of Figaro," with Madame Blanche Cole as the Countess, Madame Alice Barth as Susanna, Miss Louise Lyle as Cherubino, and Mr. Fox in the part of Figaro. This was a somewhat painful performance, owing to the too obvious infirmity of Madame Blanche Cole, whose voice in parts seemed entirely to fail her. The Susanna of Madame Barth was, as usual, piquant and sprightly. Miss Lyle made a pert and pretty page, and sang the music of the part with much refinement and good feeling; and Mr. Fox was suitably mercurial and vivacious as Figaro. In the part of Count Almaviva, Mr. Aynsley Cook did all that was possible with his means, but failed, for obvious reasons, to meet the ideal requirements of the character. On other evenings of the engagement "Faust," "Fra Diavolo," and "Il Trovatore" were played with a fair amount of success. But the band, generally, was lacking in the precision and discipline which Mr. Carl Rosa has taught us to look for in the operatic orchestra.

The Saturday Concerts of the Musical Association, though of somewhat unequal merit, continue to draw large popular audiences. On the 17th ult., when the local Sunday School Union contributed the choral part, Mr. Gaul's successful Cantata "Ruth," first produced in 1881, was performed with excellent effect, the composer conducting, followed by Sterndale Bennett's ever charming "May Queen." The choral singing, on the whole, was superior to that of the soloists, among the best numbers in Mr. Gaul's work being "Hark, the cymbals clash," which was rendered with

The musical section of the Midland Institute performed a choice selection of madrigals and part-songs on the afternoon of the 7th ult. to a numerous and appreciative audience. The choir is steadily improving in precision, delicacy, and refinement, as was shown on this occasion, more particularly in "The Silver Swan" of Orlando Gibbons, Wilbye's "Stay, Corydon," and Pearsall's famous ballad dialogue for ten voices, "Sir Patrick Spens." The solos and duets comprised Cotsford Dick's "Farewell, if ever fondest prayer," and Lucantoni's "Una notte a Venezia." Miss Margaret Wild, a pupil of the Leipzig Conservatorium, was the pianist, and gave evidence of excellent technique as well as musical intelligence in Schumann's "Etudes Symphoniques," Chopin's "Andante Spianato," and Impromptu in F sharp, Op. 36, and Brahms's Scherzo in E flat minor, Op. 4. The playing of the latter piece was excellent throughout, and awoke hearty applause. Mr. Stockley's conducting in the choral performances left nothing to be desired.

The bi-centenary of Handel's birth was celebrated by the Festival Choral Society, on the 19th ult., by an interesting and remarkably successful Miscellaneous Concert, compounded largely of familiar excerpts from the great Saxon's oratorios and cantatas. There were one or two examples also of Handel's operatic compositions, including the air "Verdi prati" from "Alcina," but this phase of the master's genius was very inadequately represented. The vocal principals were Miss Anna Williams, Miss Grace Damian, Mr. Joseph Maas, and Signor Foli. The first named lady, who was in admirable voice, was especially effective in Dejanira's recitative and air from "Hercules" "Where shall I fly?" and the well known airs "Angels ever bright and fair" ("Theodora"), and "From mighty Kings" ("Judas Maccabæus"). Miss Grace Damian, who appeared in mourning for the death of her friend and mistress, Madame Sainton-Dolby, sang "What though I trace" ("Solomon"), the operatic air before mentioned, and, with chorus, "Return, O God of Hosts" ("Samson"). In the grand recitative and air from Jephtha, "Deeper and deeper still," Mr. Maas produced a deep impression by the fervour and refinement of his singing, and he gave the ever popular" Sound an alarm," from "Judas," with clarion-like voice and spirit that roused the enthusiasm of the audience to a high pitch. Signor Foli, who joined him in the duet from "Samson," Go, baffled coward," sang the familiar air from "Joshua," "Shall I in Mamre's fertile plain," with appropriate feeling and great charm of voice, and was Diamonds" had been announced for the third evening, but rewarded with a double recall after "O ruddier than the cherry" ("Acis and Galatea"). The choral singing throughout was admirable.

Dr. Swinnerton Heap's Chamber Concert, on the 24th

January, occurred too late for mention in my last, and few words must suffice for it now. The executants, as on the opening Concert of the series, were Mr. Carrodus and Mr. Speelman, violins; Herr Bernhardt, viola; M. Vieuxtemps, violoncello; and Dr. Heap, pianoforte. The interest of the Concert centred in Dvorák's Sonata in F, Op. 57, for pianoforte and violin, which was heard on this occasion for the first time in Birmingham. The power and originality of the work, as interpreted by Dr. Heap and Mr. Carrodus, deeply impressed the audience, but more than one hearing is evidently needed for its full appreciation. A rarely heard Duo in G, of Mozart, for violin and viola, brimming over with grace and melody, was charmingly rendered by Mr. Speelman and Herr Bernhardt. Mr. Carrodus fairly took the audience by storm in Bach's Chaconne in D minor, and Dr. Heap won great applause by his finished performance of Weber's "Momento Capriccioso" in B flat, Op. 12, and a couple of dainty pieces by Henselt—the Nocturne in G flat, Op. 13, and Etude, "Si oiseau j'étais," in F sharp.

The choral rehearsals for the Festival of August next are now in full swing, the first novelty attacked being Dvorák's new Cantata, "The Spectre's Bride."

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

WITH the close of the opera season, the unusually lavish interest attaching thereto ceases, and the regular round of Concerts and Recitals must now claim the undivided attention of the musical public

The past month has not been prolific in novelties, although the return of Madame Essipoff to Liverpool, after an absence of eight years, has afforded the opportunity of appreciating the matured experience which she has developed in the interval. Her first appearance, at the eighth Subscription Concert of the Philharmonic Society, on January 20, at which Beethoven's E flat (Emperor) Concerto formed the chief item, evidenced Madame Essipoft's possession of the highest qualities of technique and perceptive force-but the subsequent Recital at St. George's Hall small Concert room, on the 31st, enabled her admirers to form a more correct judgment of her style and varied capacity. Her programme on that occasion was sufficiently diversified, including examples of Mendelssohn, Chopin, Rameau, Schubert, &c., and in Beethoven's Sonata Appassionata, Madame Essipoff's breadth of reading and executive skill shone to advantage. No amount of artistic ability can, however, justify the taking of liberties with the text, an amateurish flaw which more than once marred the executant's playing.

At the subsequent Concerts of the Philharmonic Society, on the 3rd and 10th ult. respectively, orchestral music has held the chief sway. At the former the original and always popular, if scarcely orthodox, Symphony of Raff, known as "Lenore"—and at the latter Saint-Saëns's Symphony in E flat, constituted the most prominent features in the programmes. Saint-Saëns's work is characteristic of the style of the composer, and evinces a command of orchestration, but is lacking in thoroughness and the essentials of great music-being rather flimsy in construction and development. The Scherzo and Finale from Hummel's Septet, deliciously played by Mr. Halle and the leading members of his band, formed a most enjoyable item at the ninth Concert of the Society's season.

Notwithstanding the advance in musical culture which Liverpudlians flatter themselves is gradually making headway in their native city, they are occasionally awakened to the fallacy and delusiveness of the idea that such advance is also applicable in certain circles composed of the higher strata of society. An incident at one of the recent Philharmonic Subscription Concerts, when the Conductor was obliged to administer a salutary reproof to the talking section of the audience by a temporary suspension of the performance, proves that there are those amongst the "society" and "gentry" of the neighbourhood who have yet to learn a proper appreciation of high-class orchestral music. It is hoped that the incident will have the desired

The chief feature at Mr. Halle's sixth Concert, held on January 27, in the Philharmonic Hall, was the performance of the Overture and the whole of the incidental music ance of the Overture and the whole of the incidental music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," an excellent opportunity for comparison between Mendelssohn's powers when in his teens, as illustrated by the Overture, and in his matured manhood, as evidenced in the incidental music. The same marvellous fertility of invention and refreshing vivacity is, however, apparent throughout, and the band under Mr. Hallé's direction revelled in the happy joyous character of the music, so indicative of the composer's temperament. The bright sparkling Scherzo, the rollicking gaiety of the "Dance of clowns," the serio-comicality ing gaiety of the " Dance of clowns," of Thisbe's Funeral March, and the grand broad strains of the ever-welcome Wedding March all received the faithful attention demanded by their varying phases, and were correspondingly appreciated. Saint-Saëns's Concerto in G minor also had a place at this Concert, and although perhaps somewhat uninteresting, its skilfully developed movements were perfectly rendered at the hands of Mr. Hallé. Miss Maria de Lido, the only vocalist, has a pleasing voice and good execution, but is lacking in the possession of any great dramatic intensity or force. Her best effort was in Meyerbeer's "Roberto, o tu che adoro."

The performance of Mackenzie's Cantata, "The Bride," at the Wavertree Town Hall, on January 30, was scarcely equal to the real merits of the work, or the reputation of the composer. The many beauties of the Cantata being recognised, it is hoped that the performance will be repeated on a more adequate scale.

The Crescent Choral Society, of recent origin, essayed, on the evening of the 5th ult., a rendering of Handel's Oratorio "Samson," and this ambitious effort was fairly justified by the result. The chorus, under the conductorship of Mr. G. L. Miller, showed careful training, and the vocal principals, if overweighted in one or two instances, sang their music creditably, Miss Laura Haworth, the soprano, especially distinguishing herself. Mr. S. Claude Ridley performed the duties of organist in a careful and judicious manner.

A new operetta, entitled "Mrs. Speaker; or, the Lady Legislators," composed by Mr. A. W. Borst, to the libretto of Mr. Henry Workman, and evidencing considerable tact in the amusing development of the plot and ability in the sparkling character of the music, was produced at the Lecture Hall, Waterloo, on the 16th ult., and the performance reflected general credit on those concerned.

By the recent season of English Opera-which Mr. Rosa has himself pronounced to have been the most successful ever undertaken by him-Liverpool has thoroughly evidenced its warm appreciation of the lyric drama. During the concluding weeks scenes of enthusiasm were of almost nightly occurrence, and Dr. Villiers Stanford's "Canterbury Pilgrims," tolerated with passive apathy elsewhere, received on the occasion of its first performance in this city, a fairly cordial welcome. With a libretto of sterling merit, lit up at times by episodes of bright incisive humour, and set to music of sound scholarly ability, it may, perhaps, be wondered why the success of such a work, thoroughly national in every circumstance and detail, should be held in question. The solution must rest in the fact that an opera to be popular must of necessity be planned on lines calculated to suit popular tastes. In this the "Canterbury Pilgrims" fails. There is a lack of change and variety, the second act in particular is tedious and long drawn out, and the composer, in his conscientious intention of maintaining the thoroughly classical character of the music, and in his apparent rigid adherence to the modern theory of excluding anything from the work which might be culled from it and performed with advantage as an excerpt, has, we consider, discounted the popularity of an opera which really merits a better fate.

Liverpool has taken a foremost place in celebrating, on the 19th ult., the bi-centenary of Handel by a performance worthy of the subject and the work. The selection by the Philharmonic Choral Society of "Judas Maccabæus" for such a representative commemoration was peculiarly appropriate in many respects, the martial ring which pervades it throughout being especially consonant with the present mood and spirit of the country. The Oratorio has no new singers have appeared, a record of the vocalists always taken high rank as a standard work, and its many beauties and striking effects are only equalled by the exacting demands which it makes upon the executants. The difficulties overcome only enhance the praise due to a performance of uniform excellence throughout. Miss Hamlin, of American repute, made her first appearance before a Liverpool audience and undertook the entire, and in "Judas" unusually heavy, music allotted to the soprano. Her flexible voice, admirable phrasing, and clear piquant style, added to considerable personal charms, insured for Miss Hamlin a cordial reception, Miss Marian McKenzie, Mr. Barton McGuckin, and Mr. Bantock Pierpoint completed the cast of artists. The choral portion of the work was admirably rendered, the essential features of bold, vigorous earnestness and dramatic force receiving careful attention. In some of the more striking episodes, as in the case of "Sound an alarm," splendidly declaimed by Mr. McGuckin, followed by the inspiring response "We hear the pleasing, dreadful call," and in the gradually expanding interest of "See the conqu'ring Hero comes," the effect of the whole body of chorus, orchestra, and organ was almost overpowering. The performance, preceded by the Dead March in "Saul" as a tribute of respect to the fallen heroes in the Soudan, was graced by the presence of the Mayor and Mayoress and her Majesty's Justices of Assize, and must be recorded as a memorable and complete success. Mr. Randegger conducted with his usual skill. Mr. Grimshaw presided at the organ.

Mr. Best's many friends will be gratified to learn that he is now making rapid progress towards the recovery of his usual health and vigour, and it is hoped that he may very speedily be able to resume his duties and responsi-

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

SINCE my last report, the musical event of chief interest was Mr. Halle's presentation of the "Grail" music from "Parsifal," and the second and third parts of Schumann's "Faust." The introduction to Wagner's "Festivaldrama" had previously been given here under Herr Richter's direction and at Mr. Halle's Concerts, but the remainder of the selection from the same work, including the finale to the first act, had not been publicly performed in Manchester. Concerning the power of the music, the air of mystery with which it is imbued, and the impressiveness of the general effect, no difference of opinion could exist. But, even in the quietness of a concert room, a feeling of repugnance to the introduction of so solemn a subject was aroused. Beyond doubt, the effect of portions of the music was very great, indeed, a strange weirdness and awe seemed so to oppress many of the listeners as to cause the termination of the first part of the programme to be hailed with a sigh of relief. It is difficult to imagine a greater triumph for the composer than his attainment by such simple means of so great an effect. Did the rest of the drama approach in merit the "Grail" music, "Parsifal" would be a truly noble, as well as an extremely original, work.

The second portion of the programme was not wisely arranged. It is generally held that in his setting of various scenes from the life and death of "Faust," made his nearest approach to really great choral and dramatic music. I regret that I cannot agree in this opinion; and the latest rendering of Schumann's most important choral effort leaves me unconverted. The claims of the com-poser rest upon works of a totally different kind; and he never proved his possession of that breadth of conception, that largeness of idea befitting music demanding for its adequate representation the combined powers of orchestra and choir. The "Parsifal" selection was masterly, although the subject was too solemn; but the "Faust" music was monotonous and wearying, in spite of the beauty of some of its phrases.

At Mr. Halle's other Concerts we have had many interesting orchestral works, have listened to his really great playing of Beethoven's E flat Concerto, and have enjoyed fully as much as usual Herr Joachim's annual visit. As was a very good audience.

Mr. De Jong gave on the 13th the last performance of his Subscription series, and has advertised a very attractive programme for his annual benefit.

The doings at the Concert Hall during the month have been interesting, chiefly as showing that desire to facilitate performances of chamber music which should constitute the highest claim of the institution to continued and increased support. For orchestral performances the Concert Hall is not suitable; for high-class interpretations of the noblest order of social music it is the very place, and the success of the Pianoforte Recitals must stimulate the directors to an extension of their scheme of afternoon gatherings. At the evening Concert, on the 9th ult., the pianoforte playing of Miss Houfer was greatly admired; while the unity of feeling pervading the quartet playing of Herren Risegari, Speelman, Bernhardt, and Vieuxtemps could scarcely be surpassed. These gentlemen have been associated for so many years in their attempt to popularise chamber music as to render their combined efforts ex-tremely finished and intelligent. Should the authorities of the "Gentlemen's Concerts" at last take heed of their merit, and show an appreciation of the requirements of their own position, mutual good will result and the public will be gratified. Happily, on Monday, the 16th ult., a quiet and enjoyable afternoon programme was interpreted by Mr. Hecht, Herr Schiever, and Miss Lena Little. Herr Schiever's violin playing was worthy of all admiration, and Mr. Hecht's rendering of Chopin's "Grand Fantasia was very brilliant. Let us have more of the same kind.

To an audience as crowded as ever, the Athenæum Musical Society introduced, on the 10th ult., Sir R. P. Stewart's exceedingly tuneful Cantata, "The Eve of St. John," and several scenes from Liszt's "St. Elizabeth." I believe the former work had not been performed in England (certainly not in this district), and the latter was entirely new to a Manchester audience. I strongly recommend both works (especially the "Eve of St. John") to all choral societies well supplied with good soloists.

The Carl Rosa Opera Company is announced at the Theatre Royal for a fortnight's season, commencing on the 2nd inst.

A Richter Concert (with a very strong local committee) is announced for Thursday, April 23. Herr Franke is taking wise measures to secure local interest, and to prevent a repetition of the pecuniary loss attending the former Richter Concerts here. On every ground the undertaking deserves encouragement.

The first number of the new Quarterly Musical Review was published by Mr. John Heywood, on the 20th ult., and contains long and important articles by several distinguished writers.

MUSIC IN THE WEST.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THERE has been a great deal of music going on in Bristol lately, and even more than the usual crowding in of Concerts before Lent.

On January 28 Mrs. Viner Pomeroy gave her third Classical Chamber Concert of this season, the executants being Mr. H. Holmes (first violin), Mr. M. Rice (second violin), Mr. Ellis Roberts (viola), Mr. J. Pomeroy (violon-cello), and Mrs. J. L. Roeckel (grand piano). The programme included Schubert's Quartet in B flat for two violins, viola, and cello, Beethoven's Sonata in G minor, for pianoforte and cello; solo violin, Barcarole and Scherzo, Spohr; and Mozart's Quartet in D major for two violins, viola, and cello.

Mr. John Barrett's Choir gave its fifth annual Concert on January 29, in the Lesser Colston Hall, when the chief works performed were Schubert's Mass in F and Mendelssohn's 114th Psalm. The solo parts were well rendered by Miss Annie Howell, Madame Pennington, Madame Rosa Bailey, Messrs. Morgan, Howell, and Nash; Miss Edith Sutcliffe being an efficient accompanist. of the Choir was highly creditable, and testified to much careful rehearsal. Mr. John Barrett conducted, and there

An attractive Concert in aid of the "Formidable" training ship, was given at the Victoria Rooms, on January 30. The vocal soloists were Mrs. Raye Butterworth, Miss Sconce, Madame Antoinette Sterling, Mr. Thorndike, and Mr. Edward Lloyd; the violinist, Mdlle. Gabrielle Vaillant; the pianoforte soloist, Miss Parnell; and the pianoforte accompanist, Mr. Alfred Butterworth.

Mr. George Buckland gave a Concert in the Colston Hall, on the 10th ult., before a large and enthusiastic audience. The artists were Mdlle. Marie Marimon, Miss Jennie Dickerson, Mr. H. Guy, Mr. Barrington Foote, vocalists; solo piano, Signor Tito Mattei; solo violin, Signor Papini; solo violoncello, Mons. de Munck; solo contra-basso, Signor Bottesini. With such a number of distinguished musicians it is needless to say that the Concert was an excellent one; the only thing to be regretted was the number of encores, which made the evening rather too long. Signor Bottesini's marvellous playing especially seemed to rouse the audience, and he was compelled to return to the orchestra time after time, in response to the continued applause. The programme was not a classical one, and perhaps for that reason "took" more readily with a general audience.

On the next evening, Mrs. Viner Pomeroy gave her last Concert for the season in the Victoria Rooms, before a larger audience than usual, the room presenting quite a fairly well filled aspect, instead of the rows of vacant seats that, alas, are the rule at these entertainments (to the shame of Bristol be it spoken). The executants were the same as at those of the third Concert of the series mentioned above, with the addition of Signor Pezze, violoncello. The programme consisted, as usual, of four items, Beethoven's String Quartet in B flat, No. 6; Charles Schuberth's Grande Nocturne Elegiaque, for two violoncellos, with pianoforte accompaniment; Mozart's Sonata in E flat, No. 12, for pianoforte and violin; and Schubert's Quintet in C, for two violins, viola, and two violoncellos. The performance of the quartet and quintet was not so perfect as is generally the case, and on several occasions there seemed a want of agreement among the instruments; the cello was far too heavy in the quartet, more especially in the slow movement, which suggested a want of sufficient rehearsal. The same may be said of the duet for the two cellos, of which the performance was not quite satisfactory, the higher notes being frequently out of tune. Mrs. Roeckel and Mr. Holmes gave a thoroughly artistic rendering of the sonata for pianoforte and violin, and the last quintet, in spite of its great length, seemed much appreciated, though again the effect was sometimes marred by want of compactness. We trust, in conclusion, that these delightful Concerts will be resumed next season, under more favourable circumstances as regards their finances, for we regret to hear that they are in anything but a flourishing state, and that the enterprising promoters of these entertainments annually suffer a loss.

The next event of importance, musically speaking, was the annual Ladies' Night, of the Orpheus Glee Society, which took place on the 12th ult., on which occasion Colston Hall was filled in every part some time before the hour for which the Concert was announced. Punctually at eight o'clock, Mr. George Riseley took his place at the conductor's desk, amid warm greetings from both choir and audience. The voices numbered seventy-five, and were distributed as follows: seventeen altos, ten first tenors, eighteen second tenors, fourteen first basses, and sixteen second basses. The programme was a varied and interesting one, comprising several pieces performed for the first time by the Society, as well as many old favourites. To say that Mr. Riseley has for several years conducted the Society is almost sufficient to account for the marvellous effects produced, it being at times difficult to realise that they are all the work of the body of voices before us. The annual Concert, to which the Orpheus Glee Society limits itself, is one of the events Bristol may well be proud of, as the execution of each number is so perfect that criticism is out of place, and this year was no exception to the general rule. The precision, neatness, and especially the light and shade, were all most remarkable, and the various solos were creditably rendered by local voices, generally by members of the Cathedral there was a slight attempt to induce him to break his rule after Mr. Ben Gay's solo, "Ye banks and braes." We append the programme: "Strike the lyre" (T. Cooke), "The long day closes" (Arthur Sullivan), "Hushed in Death" (H. Hiles), Hymn to Night (Beethoven), "Thou art my dream" (J. G. Metzger), "Are the white hours" art my dream" (J. G. Metzger), "Are the white hours" (Callcott), "Beauties have you seen a toy" (C. Evans), "Hohenlinden" (T. Cooke), "Hie thee, shallop" (Kücken). "Bind my brows" (Stainer), "Oh the Summer Night" (Cummings), "Ye banks and braes" (Burns), "No more the morn" (Bishop), "The Retreat" (L. de Rille), "The Complaint" (Graner), "Foresters, sound the cheerful horn" (Bishop), "The Chafers" (Truhn), "On the March" (V. F. Becker) (V. E. Becker).

An interesting Concert was given at Colston Hall on the 13th ult., in aid of the Railway Servants' Orphanage. The entertainment was one of a series of six similar gatherings held during that week at Birmingham, Cheltenham, Worcester, Gloucester, and Bath. The artists who appeared were Madame Frances Brooke (soprano), Miss Appeared well and the Hilda Wilson (contralto), Mr. Abercrombie (tenor), Mr. Joseph Lynde (bass), Mr. E. G. Woodward (solo violin), Mr. A. Van Holst (solo pianoforte and accompanist), and

Mr. George Riseley (solo organ).

The Saturday Musical Association gave a Concert on the 14th ult., at Colston Hall, with full band, organ, and chorus. The programme was miscellaneous; the principal vocalists were Miss Julia Jones, Messrs. Morgan and Thomas. Mr. Riseley contributed two organ solos, and Mr. George Gordon conducted.

On the 12th ult. Mr. Alfred Foley gave his first annual Concert in aid of the funds of the Salisbury Infirmary, at the Assembly Rooms, Salisbury, when he was gratified by the presence of a crowded and fashionable audience. This being his first appearance as a Conductor, we cannot do less than congratulate him on his success. The orchestra less than congratulate him on his success. consisted of forty performers, and included the principal instrumentalists of the neighbourhood, and it was quite evident that they had been carefully drilled. The programme included Haydn's "Queen" Symphony, Schumann's "Child's Dream," and other interesting items. The vocalists were Miss Alice Young and Mr. Reginald Groome. Mr. South, the Organist of the Cathedral, presided at the organ, and Miss Curzon at the pianoforte, and Mr. Alfred Foley was the principal violin.

A free entertainment was given by Mr. Augustus Aylward in the Assembly Rooms, Salisbury, on the 14th ult., for the working-class, the hall being crowded to excess. The orchestra numbered about thirty-five performers, and performed the March from "Le Prophête," ballet music "Sylvia," "Mignon" Gavotte, the Overture to "Crown Diamonds," &c. The vocalists were Miss C. Cusse, Miss K. Hall, Mr. J. A. Pitman and Mr. Snook, all of whom were encored in their respective songs. Mr. J. T. Calkin was the leader, and Mr. A. Aylward conducted. Miss Aylward announces six Concerts for the ensuing season, three ballad and three chamber music. Mr. Augustus Aylward has been appointed Conductor of St. Martin's Choral Society, and Sir Sterndale Bennett's "May Queen" is to be given at the next Concert.

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

BEFORE commencing the record of events which occurred during the past month, it is necessary to repair an inadvertent omission. On the 14th of January a Concert was given at the Albert Hall, Leeds, in aid of the St. Vincent's Home for Boys, the occasion being musically important owing to the production of two new sacred works by local composers. One was a setting of the 141st Psalm, by Mr. A. E. Grimshaw, Organist of St. Anne's Catholic Cathedral, and the other a Cantata entitled "The Prodigal Son," by the Rev. James F. Downes. Both created a favourable impression, the former especially. Mr. Grimshaw is obviously a sound musician, but although his Psalm contains a good deal of contrapuntal writing, and the style is eminently church-like, it is free from scholastic dryness Choir. As is always the case when Mr. Riseley has the or pedantry. The harmonies are at times suggestive of management of affairs, no encores were permitted, though Gounod, at others of Spohr, while there is a trace of Mendelssohnian feeling in some of the melodic figures. The Cantata is a more elaborate work, and needs greater space than can now be given to do it justice. The accompaniments were arranged for two pianofortes and a har-monium in the absence of an orchestra. The works were well rendered, especial praise being due to Mr. George Tetley, a very able Conductor.

Although the Ballad Concert, which has for some years past occupied a place in the arrangements of the Bradford Subscription Concerts Committee, finds many opponents among the subscribers, it is invariably regarded as a pleasant change from the more substantial fare of which the Concerts are usually constituted. The fifth Concert of the season, which took place on the 6th ult., was devoted to the performance, not exactly of ballads, but of songs and detached compositions of a description which raised the Concert far above the ordinary level. The vocalists who took part in the programme were Miss Clara Samuell, Miss Damian, Mr. Maas, and Mr. Barrington Foote. The one remarkable feature of the programme, however, was the playing of Madame Essipoff, who bracketed a wonderful variety and number of minor pieces for her two solos. One of Field's Nocturnes, a novelty which was especially enjoyed; two of Chopin's compositions, a Nocturne and an Etude; and a Schubert-Liszt valse were among the items included in her solos, both of which were encored. For the sixth and final Concert of the season, on the 6th inst., the Committee announce Dvorák's "Stabat Mater," and the miscellaneous selection will include an extract from Wagner's "Parsifal."

The Manningham Vocal Union, in celebrating its nineteenth session, on January 27, did good service to music in Bradford by producing, apparently for the first time in Yorkshire, Sir Julius Benedict's Cantata "Graziella." The work was warmly welcomed, and the production was very creditable to the Society. The one serious drawback was the want of an orchestra, without which it was difficult to do justice to the graceful and picturesque music which Sir Julius has wedded to the romantic story. The parts were in the capable hands of Miss Blackburn, Mrs. Ashcroft Clark, Mr. Arthur Broughton, Mr. Charles Kingsley, and Mr. W. Hunter. Mr. James H. Rooks conducted the performance with admirable skill.

Mr. Carl Rosa's Opera Company commenced a brief season of opera in St. George's Hall, Bradford, on the 9th ult. The engagement proved somewhat disappointing to the public, and doubtless also to Mr. Rosa. Beyond the "Beggar Student," which was given in Bradford for the first time, and "Fidelio," which as usual proved a genuine attraction, there was nothing in the list of operas produced during the week that calls for notice.

The Piano and Violin Recitals of Herr Christensen and Mr. Edgar Haddock have recently attained to a considerable degree of success among musical devotees in Leeds and Bradford. The two artists gave a Recital of superior merit in the Bradford Church Institute on the 11th ult., and considering the number and variety of similar Concerts which have lately taken place in the town, they were favoured with a large audience. Herr Christensen's remarkable technical ability has already been spoken of in the columns of THE MUSICAL TIMES, and his performance on this occasion, in which he devoted himself chiefly to Chopin's music, confirmed the favourable impression previously recorded. But Mr. Haddock's violin solos proved to be the choicest morsels of the evening. Not only in the matter of physical accomplishment, but in quality of tone, phrasing, and general intelligence, his solos were things of beauty. The concerted pieces were well selected, and were performed with equal power and finish as the solos. Herr Christensen and Mr. Haddock intend shortly to perform Beethoven's ten sonatas for piano and violin.

Mr. J. T. Carrodus gave a Violin Recital in his native town, Keighley, on the 16th ult. The programme included several familiar works, well calculated to bring out all the fine qualities of the English virtuoso. Perhaps his most brilliant performances were an Allegretto Grazioso, by Molique, and a Chaconne, by Bach. The vocalist was Miss Bertha Moore, who was heard to advantage in several well-known ballads.

A Concert was given in the Leeds Town Hall, on the 14th ult., in memoriam of those who have fallen in the war in the Soudan. The proceeds were intended to go to the fund now being raised for the widows and orphans and wounded soldiers. The vocalists were Madame Pauline Evison, Messrs. Fisher, Heath, Gilbert Jackson, and Dodds. The programme included the Dead March in "Saul," and Schubert's Funeral March in C minor, which were played on the organ by Dr. Spark, and one of the songs given was the joint composition of Dr. Spark and Mr. Digby Seymour, Q.C

The Leeds Amateur Orchestral Society's second Concert of the season took place in the Albert Hall, on the 17th ult. The improvement noticed in the previous performances of the Society was still more apparent on this occasion. Their chief efforts were directed, somewhat ambitiously, to the performance of Beethoven's No. 1 Symphony in C major (Op. 21), the four movements of which were attacked with most creditable results. Weber's Concerto for piano and orchestra (Op. 29) also received skilful interpretation. Mr. Whewall Bowling, brother of the Conductor, was the solo pianist, and contributed a Suite, numbered Op. 3, of his own composition. Mr. Bowling has written much music of great value, and the Suite is not the least musicianly production which has come from his pen. The work-in three movements, Menuetto e Trio, Adagio, and Rondo scherzoso-is full of originality and purity of sentiment, and was received with great cordiality by the critical audience assembled. Mr. Hall's flute solos proved highly acceptable. Mr. Woodhouse Neale (baritone) was the vocalist, and Mr. J. P. Bowling was the Conductor.

Arrangements have been made by the Leeds Musical Festival Committee for a Richter Concert, to take place in the Leeds Town Hall on April 22. A guarantee fund is being raised to meet the necessary expenses. Dr. Spark's free Organ Concerts, in the Leeds Town Hall, continue to be devoted to the study of the great composers, and the performances of the Borough Organist invariably attract large audiences.

Apart from the ordinary interest attaching to the Leeds Popular Concerts, the visit of Mr. August Manns and his famous orchestra, in connection with the fifth of those Concerts, attracted a large audience, many of whom travelled from distant parts of the country. The performance was a notable one, and probably, had not Mr. Hallé so completely disciplined the minds of the musical public in this district, the splendid abilities of the Crystal Palace band would have proved really wonderful. The programme included the "Leonora" Overture, which has been heard a good many times-at least, in St. George's Hall-and the marvellous beauties of which were brought out with great brilliancy. The band played with equal effect selections from "Die Meistersinger," "The Rose of Sharon," Berlioz's arrangement of Weber's "L'Invitation à la Valse," and the ballet music from "La Gioconda." haps most interest was concentrated, however, upon Schubert's Symphony in C major, which has of late received the Op. No. 10. The opportunity of hearing a work of such colossal grandeur, of such sublimity and fluency of idea, was indeed welcome, and not only did it nourish the ever-increasing love for the tender-souled genius of Schubert, but it did perhaps more than anything else to secure respect for Mr. Manns's forces on this occasion. This was the first performance of the Symphony in this district, and it was one more and a highly important addition to the long list of works by Schubert which have been heard for the first time in Yorkshire this season. Miss Gertrude Griswold was the vocalist, and her singing was highly appreciated.

MUSIC IN EDINBURGH.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE last but one of the present series of Choro-Orchestral Concerts, under the auspices of the Edinburgh Choral Union, took place on the 2nd ult. The programme began with, for the first time at these Concerts, the late Friedrich Smetana's "Lustspiel Ouverture," or "Overture to a Comedy." The composer of "Vitava" appears here in a totally different character, that of a humorist, and yet musicianship is as much present in the lighter emanation from the pen which has now been dropped for ever as in the graver musical thoughts of his with which we had become acquainted. The second part was headed with Beethoven's Symphony No. 5, in F. Chopin's Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra (No. 1, in E minor) afforded an opportunity of hearing the distinguished Russian pianist, Madame Essipoff, whose powerful yet elegant method was evidently much appreciated. The now well-known Rosamunde Entr'acte and ballet music, and the equally familiar "Tannhäuser" Overture, were the remaining orchestral selections of this Concert, which was the last of the instrumental series proper. Mdlle. Soubre, I should add, was the vocalist.

The concluding Concert (on the 9th ult.) was devoted to Handel, in commemoration of the bi-centenary of the great composer's birth. Instead of presenting a complete Oratorio, the Committee wisely, perhaps, prepared a programme of selections from Oratorios more or less familiar. The Concert opened with the Hallelujah Chorus from "The Messiah," by the full choir, orchestra and organ. Subsequently choral and solo vocal selections were given from "Israel in Egypt," "Solomon," and "Samson," the choir, as a rule, singing very well, and the solo principals, Miss Annie Marriott, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. P. Glencorse, giving a highly effective rendering of the music assigned to them. Unfortunately, Madame Patey, who was likewise engaged, was unable from hoarseness to sing. The orchestra played the Overture "Occasional Oratorio." Mr. T. H. Collinson conducted and Mr. C. Bradley was at the organ. Altogether the season has been a prosperous one. We shall ere long hear the actual financial results, but they cannot but be satisfactory.

The Edinburgh Select Choir, not to be behind in respect for the memory of the great composer, also gave a Concert of Handelian music on Saturday, the 7th ult., in the Music Hall. The chorus, from "Acis and Galatea," "O the pleasure of the plains," was sung with much effect other successfully rendered choral extracts were "But as for his people," and "See the conquiring hero comes." The effort of Miss Pillans in "From mighty kings" may be referred to as worthy of special praise. Mr. Henry Hartley conducted, and likewise accompanied the soloists. Mr. John Hartley accompanied the Choir on the organ, and also played the "Occasional Overture."

On the afternoon of the same day a Concert was given in the Masonic Hall, George Street, by Herr Otto Schweizer, assisted by Miss C. H. Charters, and Messrs. Hamilton, Waddell, Winram, and Mackenzie. Schumann's Phantasiestücke, Op. 88, for violin, violoncello, and pianoforte, was played with evenness and ease, the Humoreske being rendered with appropriate gaiety. There were no fewer than three of Herr Schweizer's instrumental compositions in the programme, his own part in the execution of which fully sustained his reputation here. In one of these, a duet for violoncello and piano, the composer, for whom Scotch music seems to have a special attraction, has introduced a Strathspey in the third movement. A Quintet, by Carl Goldmark, Op. 30, served to display the combined talents of the instrumental party assisting the Concert-giver. Miss Charters contributed with much success three songs, Mr. Franklin Paterson accompanying.

Two Organ Recitals were given by Sir Herbert Oakeley on the afternoons of January 22 and of the 5th ult. The programme of the former, at which there was a large and distinguished audience, comprised selections from Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Gluck, Beethoven, Gounod, Weber, and Bishop. Mozart's motett, "Splendente te, Deus," arranged for organ, brought out the full powers of the instrument. Various orchestral effects were cleverly illustrated in the several compositions performed. At the second Recital the various items in the programme rendered by the Professor on the University Organ were, as customary, selected by him from the music for the Reid Festival. The selections included the time-honoured Introduction, Pastorale, and March by General Reid, and another Minuet, which had not been before heard on the organ. Of the various airs, the favourite "Dove sei, amate bene," of Handel, was specially effective on the instrument; and the Professor's own song, "Ad amore," was encored. The Romance from Haydn's Symphony in B flat, and the Andante from Beethoven's

C minor Symphony, brought out some good effects, in the latter case thoroughly orchestral in style. There was a large proportion of students among the audience.

The forty-fifth annual Concert, in memory of General Reid, Founder of the Chair of Music in the University, took place on the 13th ult. As usual, Mr. Charles Halle's Manchester Orchestra was engaged, and the vocal and instrumental soloists were Signorina Barbi, Mr. Joseph Maas, Madame Norman-Néruda, and Mr. Hallé. The Concert opened with General Reid's Minuet and March, the latter being well known as "The Garb of old Gaul." The audience showed respect to the memory of the testator by standing up while the latter favourite air was being played. The overture to "Oberon" followed, and subsequently were performed Spohr's Violin Concerto in E minor, No. 7 (Op. 30), with Madame Néruda as soloist; and Beethoven's C minor Symphony, No. 5, superbly played. This Symphony happens to have been included in the programme of the first Reid Concert, nearly half-acentury ago, when, as one may venture to say, it would be appreciated by but few compared to the numbers who now enjoy the lengthiest even of abstract orchestral com-positions. Two movements from Chopin's Pianoforte Concerto No. 1, Op. 11 (Mr. Hallé, soloist), formed an agreeable item in the programme, the orchestra admirably com-bining with the pianoforte towards the general effect. A Suite from Bach, and Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" Overture were also performed. Sir Herbert Oakeley's tuneful Canzonetta "Ad amore" was charmingly sung by Mr. Maas, and had to be repeated. Signorina Barbi warbled with cultivated taste a Cavatina from Rossini's "Cenerentola,"

The programmes of Professor Oakeley's usual supplementary Concerts on the Saturday and Monday following included chiefly, at the former, Cherubini's Overture "Les Abencerrages," Haydn's Symphony in B flat (La Reine de France), Beethoven's Pianoforte Concerto, No. 4, Gade's "In the Highlands," and the Overture to "Tannhäuser" (somewhat heavily played); and at the latter, a Symphony in D major by Dvorák, new to Scotland; the introduction to Wagner's "Parsifal," and the overtures "Fidelio" (Beethoven), "Le Carnaval Romain" (Berlioz), and "Le Nozze di Figaro (Mozart). There were likewise solos by Mr. Hallé and Madame Néruda; Signorina Barbi singing with good effect two Italian songs.

I cannot help thinking, however, that, highly as Professor Oakeley's efforts to increase the importance of the Reid Festival are to be esteemed, one, at least, of the three Concerts ought to be Choro-Orchestral; that is to say, that an Oratorio, or other similar work for solo voices, chorus, and orchestra, of which we have now so many splendid old and new examples to choose from, should form part of the general Festival, or of the Reid Concert proper. Were this done, I venture to think that the able occupant of the Reid Chair would yet more satisfactorily carry out the spirit of the intentions of the founder in providing for the annual Concert.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

At the eleventh Subscription Concert of the Choral Union Series, on the 3rd ult., the chief novelty was the late Friedrich Smetana's "Comedy-Overture," performed last winter at the Philharmonic Concerts at Berlin and at the Crystal Palace Concerts. No one who had heard the performance here of the same composer's symphonic poem "Vitava," a season or two ago, could have believed him to possess such a marked vein of humour, and the work came therefore as a pleasant surprise. It is not necessary to say more than that the scholarship displayed in the composition was as much appreciated as its gaiety was enjoyed. The Symphony of the evening was Beethoven's No. 8, in F (Op. 93), last performed here in the season of 1880-81. Madame Essipoff made her first appearance at these Concerts on this occasion, playing with much effect Chopin's Pianoforte Concerto, No. 7, in E minor, which was warmly received. The familiar Entriacte in B flat and Ballet Air in G, from Schubert's "Rosamunde" music, and the Overture to "Tannhäuser," were the remaining purely orchestral numbers. Mélle. Anna Soubre remaining purely orchestral numbers.

sang Gounod's "O ma lyre immortelle" and the Gavotte from "Mignon," "Me voici."

In continuation of the arrangement instituted by Dr. Hans von Bülow in the year when he conducted these Concerts, a plébiscite was taken on the above evening of pieces desired to be heard again, at the close of the season, and the following are some of the works which received the highest votes under the different divisions of classification. Among Symphonies, Beethoven's No. 5 in C minor, and No. 6. [Pastoral), stood highest; among Overtures, "The Magic Flute," "Tannhäuser," and Overtures, "The Magic Flute," "Tannhäuser," and Leonore" (No. 3); among Ballet Airs and Dance Music, Ballo in B minor and Curtain Tune in G ("Rosamunde"), Gavottes, Nos. 1 and 2, from Suite in D (Bach); and among Miscellaneous, the more familiar numbers from the "Rosamunde" music, some selections from "Faust" (Berlioz), and the Scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream" (Mendelssohn). A bléhisite was also taken at Dream" (Mendelssohn). A plebiscite was also taken at the Saturday Concert of January 31, at which Schubert's No. 9 Symphony in C, and the Overtures "Génoveva" (Schumann), and "The merry wives of Windsor" (Nicolai), were the principal numbers. Among the compositions receiving the greatest number of votes at this plebiscite were Beethoven's Pastoral (for which as high as 429 votes were recorded), and Brahms's "Lenore" and Berlioz's "Harold" Symphonies; "William Tell," "Magic Flute," "Flying Dutchman," and "Der Freischütz" Overtures, the latter two 140 votes each; Gavotte, "Yellow Jasmine" (Cowen); Mr. Manns's "Indian Plait Dance"; and Schubert's Ballo and Curtain Tune; Weber's "Invitation to the Waltz," Prelude in A ("Lohengrin"), and Largo in F (for strings), Haydn.

At the Concert of Saturday evening, 7th ult., a programme, "Suffrage Universel," was submitted, including the "Magic Flute" Overture, Pastoral Symphony, and other selections from the most highly favoured composi-tions above mentioned. The audience was probably the very largest that has ever yet assembled within St. Andrew's Hall.

During the following week three Concerts were given by the Union, entirely drawn from Handel, and commemoratively of the bi-centenary of the composer's birth. Tuesday, the 10th ult., a performance was given of "Israel in Egypt," with Miss Annie Marriott, Madame Patey, and Mr. Edward Lloyd in the solo parts. The Oratorio was rendered in its entirety. It is ten years since it was last given by the Glasgow Choral Union, and as far therefore as the choristers were concerned, it would be an altogether new study for the greater proportion of their numbers. Through the conscientious and persevering training of Mr. Allan Macbeth, Chorus-director, the performance was excellent. The refinement of tone to which the choir has now attained was particularly brought out in "He led them forth," while the symphonic intricacies of "He led them through the deep" were gone through without hesi-The platform of the great Hall, I should not omit to say, however, is not very well arranged for choral purposes. The organ bulges out in the centre, and thereby cuts off perhaps one-half of each of the male parts from the view and direct hearing of the other.

On Thursday, the 12th ult., the programme was made up of selections from Handel, vocal and instrumental, such as the Overture "Occasional Oratorio," Concerto for Organ and Orchestra, and for two orchestras, the Coronation Anthem and choruses from "Saul," "Theodora," "Acis and Galatea," "Solomon," and "Joshua." Madame Patey, who had recovered from her hoarseness, sang "What though I trace" and "Verdi prati," and Mr. Edward Lloyd, "Deeper and deeper still" and "Sound an alarm." Dr. A. L. Peace officiated at the organ. On the Saturday following, finally closing the season, choral and orchestral excerpts from the commemorated master again formed the programme. Madame Patey was the solo vocalist, and Mr.

Allan Macbeth conducted.

The Rutherglen Philharmonic Union gave a Concert of English, Irish, and Scotch vocal selections, in the Burgh Hall, on the 13th ult., Mr. Charles Bryce conducting. The glees "Hail, smiling morn" and "Strike the lyre," and second; and several of Mr. Lambeth's admired arrangements of Scotch melodies in the third part.

Encouraged by the success of their Concert on the 28th of January, which event I was unable to report in my February letter, the "Heckmann Quartet," from Cologne, who are all members of the present year's orchestra, gave another entertainment on the 16th ult., when the String Quartet of Mozart in F major, No. 8, and of Beethoven in C major (Op. 59, No. 3) were, with selected movements from others, played, Mr. Albert B. Bach, accompanied by Mrs. Bach on the pianoforte, contributed an Aria from Handel, and Lieder from Franz, Schubert, and Schumann. The room taken, St. Andrew's (Berkeley) Hall, was overcrowded; a much larger one might well have been Madame Essipoff gave a Pianoforte Recital on the 10th ult. The selection was very varied, Chopin predominating, however, as was not unnatural. As an exponent of the Polish composer, Madame Essipoff made in particular a most marked impression.

The Glasgow Select Choir gave a performance of Cowen's Cantata "The Rose Maiden," on 21st ult., in St. Andrew's Hall. The same excellence which marks the Choir's interpretation of glees, madrigals, part-songs, and similar smaller pieces, were noticeable in their rendering of the above admired composition, the solos as well as the choral parts being conspicuous for grace of delivery and intelligence. Mr. Thomas Berry accompanied on the piano, Mr. W. D. Swan being at the harmonium. Mr. James Allan conducted.

The date of performance, for the first time in Scotland, of Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's new dramatic Oratorio "The Rose of Sharon," by the Glasgow Tonic Sol-fa Choral Society, under Mr. W. M. Miller, is fixed for Tuesday evening, the 17th inst., in St. Andrew's Hall. The following artists have been engaged-Mrs. Hutchinson, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Watkin Mills, and the chorus and orchestra will number 500. I understand the choral rehearsals are progressing very satisfactorily.

I may note the successful production of Haydn's Oratorio "The Creation" by the Ayr Choral Union, on the 13th ult., under the direction of Mr. Hugh McNabb. The choir numbered 150 voices, and the accompaniments were played by the Glasgow Choral Union orchestra. The soloists were Madame Lita Jarratt, Mr. E. Dunkerton, and Mr. D.

Harrison. Mr. J. B. Cowap was at the organ.

OBITUARY.

MADAME SAINTON-DOLBY .- The death of this eminent artist took place at her residence in Gloucester Place, Hyde Park, on the 18th ult. Her remains were laid to rest with those of her mother in Highgate Cemetery on the Monday following.

Charlotte Helen Dolby first saw the light in London, May 17, 1821. As a child she was not brought at all into special connection with music or the musical profession. Like other daughters of the trading classes, she went to school with no more definite aim than that of receiving a general education such as might qualify for whatever of comparatively humble fortune the future had in store. Charlotte was first placed under a Mrs. Sulch, who kept a small "establishment for young ladies," and included in her course the indispensable "accomplishment" of pianoforte playing. The child Dolby took kindly to this. Music spoke to her through the strumming of the scholastic instrument, and she answered it; the dialogue being in effect a call and an acceptance. Under these circumstances Mrs. Sulch's pupil soon ran ahead of her fellows. She became the show-girl of the school, and, no doubt, a source of pride, perhaps of profit, to her worthy instructress, at whose breaking-up parties the little one made a conspicuous figure. Charlotte's parents took note of their daughter's talents, and "pondered these things in their heart." Music might be the vocation marked out for her by nature; wherefore, to give the question fair trial, she was sent for further and more advanced pianoforte study to a Mrs. Montague. Meanwhile, her the madrigal "Flora gave me fairest flowers," were sung voice was not neglected. Just here we see the wisdom of in the first part; arrangements of "The meeting of the injunction never to "despise the day of small things." waters" (Macfarren), and "Rory O'More" (Hume), in the The organ which afterwards became the majestic contralto known and admired by England and the Continent, was then capable of no more than a faint piping, out of which, as it seemed, nothing good could come. Nevertheless, the most was made of it by a course of elementary training, and we may assume that the child continued giving signs of promise strong enough to attract remark and suggest her future. When she was about ten years of age her father died, and the family had, in homely phrase, to look about them. Upon the children who were capable came the obligation of going early into the world of work, and Charlotte took the road marked out for her by nature. At that time the Royal Academy of Music was a young institution running on lines in some respects different from the present. Pupils were taken at any age between ten and fifteen, and received their education, with board and lodging, for the small annual payment of five guineas. On these terms Charlotte Helen Dolby, nothwithstanding her poor little voice, was received into the establishment. Later, however, she obtained a King's Scholarship and was thus made less dependent upon her widowed mother. The girl soon began to attract attention to her person and musical gifts. Nature had been bountiful in both respects. She was often spoken of as the "beautiful Miss Dolby," while the increasing development and charm of her voice strengthened the hopes excited by a fine musical organisation. About the year 1840 Miss Dolby began to show herself on conspicuous platforms. She often sang in the semi-chorus formed of Academy pupils at the Antient Concerts; while in 1841 she took part in a concerted piece for solo voices under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society. Started now on her career, the young lady rapidly made way in her profession, helped in no small measure by Mendelssohn, who, having heard her sing in "St. Paul" during one of his visits to this country, immediately sought her acquaintance, and on his return to Germany used his influence to obtain for her a hearing in that land. His efforts were so successful that, in 1846, the year of "Elijah," Miss Dolby appeared at the Gewandhaus, Leipzig, with such success that she resolved to make a further appeal to the judgment of Continental amateurs. France and Holland supported the verdict of Germany upon the young artist's claims, and then her English fame grew more and more till none could dispute her rank as premier contralto. How large a space Miss Dolby filled in general esteem thenceforward till her retirement in 1870 it is needless to indicate. In oratorio and English song she was indispensable on all important occasions; never was singer more uniformly welcome, and never did an honoured artist bear success with greater dignity and lack of self-assertiveness. In 1860 Miss Dolby, who, out of devotion to her mother and her family, had remained unmarried, happily united herself to M. Prosper Sainton, the eminent violinist, the issue of the union being a son, Mr. Charles Sainton, who promises to make his name as honoured among painters as it now is by musicians. Shortly after her retirement from the public platform, Madame Sainton founded a Vocal Academy, which she carried on to the day of her death in a very successful manner, many well-trained singers and teachers having come from under her hands. She also devoted a great deal of time to composition. Not a few of her songs are well known and popular, but Madame Sainton was not satisfied with such distinction as this. She aimed at higher rank, and in pursuit of it wrote no fewer than four cantatas:—" Dorothea," "The Story of the faithful Soul" -these have been published and performed-" Thalassa," which remains in MS., and another composed during the last few months, and soon to be published by Messrs. Novello and Co. In all these works there is evidence of more than mere effort. Madame Sainton began serious composition late in life, but it is clear that she was justified in doing so at any time. She had graceful ideas and could express them well. The lamented lady's last appearance in public was at her husband's farewell Concert in the Albert Hall, in June, 1883. On that occasion she sang "Tears, idle tears," and "Strangers yet" with much of her old command over the springs of sympathy.

Madame Sainton-Dolby is deeply mourned by a large circle of friends, who have lost in her one whom they greatly valued. The crowd at her funeral, and the genuine than "storied urn or animated bust," to her worth as a woman and an artist. May she rest in peace.

LEOPOLD DAMROSCH.—The death is announced on the 16th ult., at New York, of Dr. Leopold Damrosch, the excellent and energetic Director of the recently founded German Opera at that city, whose first season had just been most successfully concluded. Dr. Damrosch was born at Posen in 1832. He devoted him-self to the study of medicine at Berlin and eventually became a successful candidate for academical honours, while at the same time he cultivated with characteristic energy his favourite art, music. Abandoning his profession for the pursuit of the latter, he soon became a leading member of the Weimar Orchestra, then under the direction of Liszt, and in this position became intimately acquainted with Bülow, Tausig, Raff, and others, from whom he imbibed his subsequent predilection for the more advanced school of the art. After accompanying Bülow and Tausig on several Concert-tours, he became musical director at Breslau, which post he quitted in 1871 for the more influential one of Conductor of the "Arion" Choral Society, at New York. Dr. Damrosch's career in America was extended, useful, and successful, while of late years he has occupied a very conspicuous and honourable posi-tion in New York as Conductor of the Oratorio Society, founded by him in 1873, and of the Symphony Society, also founded by him in 1878. This culminated during the present year with a brilliant season of German opera under his direction at the new lyric theatre in the Empire City. Dr. Damrosch had all the musical weight of that venture on his shoulders. He went to Germany, engaged artists, superintended rehearsals, and conducted six performances per week; doing all with marvellous enthusiasm. We shall not be surprised to hear that he has fallen a victim to overwork, collapsing suddenly under the great burden which might have crushed a far younger man. Dr. Damrosch leaves, two sons in the profession, one being Organist of the Episcopal Cathedral, Denver, the other filling a like position at Mr. Henry Ward Beecher's church in Brooklyn.

A SPECIAL performance of Mackenzie's Oratorio "The Rose of Sharon," will be given on Friday evening, the 20th inst. An exceptionally fine rendering is guaranteed by the announcement that the solos will be sung by Madame Albani, Madame Patey, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley; and further, that the composer will come from Italy expressly to conduct the performance himself. The choruses will be sung by a choir brought together specially for the purpose. Mr. Eaton Faning, who is rapidly becoming known as one of the best choir-trainers, will have charge of the preliminary rehearsals.

THE Annual Dinner of the South London Musical Club took place at the Holborn Restaurant on Saturday evening. the 7th ult. The chair was occupied by Sir George Macfarren, and many distinguished visitors were present. About 180 members and friends sat down to dinner, and the proceedings afterwards were of an interesting character. After the toast of "the Queen," Sir George Macfarren, in proposing that of "The Club," gave a very interesting account of the progress of male voice part-singing in England, from the earliest time. He said that when there were but three figures in the date, a number of monks crossed from the Monastery of the White Choir in Ireland, went up the Solway, reached Newcastle, and there introduced among the people their habit of singing concerted music. Hereward the Saxon and his friends, on going on a visit to Cornwall, was admitted to the wedding feast of the daughter of the king, because of their excellent singing, in the manner of the Eastern counties, of songs of three parts; and on this account they were well entertained, occupied a seat at the high table, and were allowed to drink the health of the bride. Further on, in the thirteenth century, were written and practised compositions for six men's voices, and those which were extant were earlier than any written music of any Christian country. Again, at the Court of King Henry VIII., those persons were best esteemed at his Court who were able and willing to take sorrow there manifested, testify to this, and also, far more part with him in the three-part songs for men's voices, of which the King was very fond. At the time when Henry had occasion to send Cromwell on an embassy to Pope Julian, Cromwell took with him a party of English singers, who so delighted the Pope by their performances outside the tent, where he was taking the air, that he was already predisposed to grant the King's suit. Although it was said that in the time of the Commonwealth music was dethroned from the heart of the English people, in that period was published the collection of tunes known as the "Dancing Master," comprising all the beautiful ballad melodies which so distinguishes our national music. John Playford also published a collection of "Airs and Dialogues," which comprised three compositions, the first that ever were defined by the title "Glee." The Glee is there used as the expression of a convivial and mirthful state of mind, and thus an explanation is obtained of the mysterious word Glee. Sir George then alluded to the influence of Italian Opera, and then went on to say that in the same year that Handel wrote "The Messiah," 1741, was instituted the Madrigal Society. The original members were of a humble class, a conspicuous person among them being John Hawkins, a lawyer's elerk, who afterwards became a magistrate. He obtained knighthood, and wrote a ponderous work entitled "The History of Music." No one was admitted who could not sing his part at sight, before the assembled members. The subscription was three shillings a quarter, which included a supper. The Glee Societies were instituted later, and were societies of gentlemen who met more for the pleasures of the table than for the delights They engaged professional singers to sing to them while they were engaged over their glasses. The people themselves were now re-asserting that love of music which he regarded as especially a characteristic of Englishmen, and he thought that societies like the South London Musical Club were very important in combining the fraternal feeling with the art-feeling, prompting to greater efforts. He learned that the Society had passed through ten years of its life, having been instituted on January 27, 1875, a day for ever dedicated to the greatest of musicians, Mozart, it being his birthday. Very sound work was being done by the club, and the thanks of all present were due to the gentlemen who had instituted it. He wished them long life, constant prosperity, and ceaseless advancement in the performance of the masterpieces they undertook. The President of the Club, in responding, gave some particulars of the rise and progress of the Club. They now numbered 220 members, eighty of whom were singing members. Ten smoking Concerts, and three high-class evening Concerts were given throughout the year, admittance to all being by invitation. Their financial position was excellent, for they had money invested in Consols. Mr. Chas. Stevens, the Musical Director, proposed the health of the Chairman, and the Rev. J. Colbeck and Mr. Henry Gadsby responded to the toast of "The Visitors." A selection of part-songs, including "The Beleaguered" (Sullivan), "Father of Heroes" (Callcott), "King Canute" (Sir G. A. Macfarren), an "Italian Salad" (R. Genée), and "Chinese March" were performed, and solos by Messrs. Pompe and Ponsford were contributed. It may be remembered that shortly after the occasion of the last annual dinner, presided over by Mr. J. Barnby, the Gresham Hall, which had recently been taken over by a Company formed amongst the members of the Club, was burned to the ground. The company was, however, fully insured, and is now in possession of a handsome hall, of unrivalled acoustic properties, with very convenient offices. A new organ, of three manuals, by Bevington, has just been added.

THE Members of the Gravesend and Milton Choral Association gave avery successful performance of Handel's 'Messiah,' on Monday evening, the 16th ult., in honour of the bi-centenary of the composer's birth. The solo vocalists were Mrs. Hutchinson, Miss Cravino, Mr. A. Kenningham, and Mr. Bridson. Mrs. Hutchinson was in excellent voice, and her rendering of "I know that my Redeemer liveth" produced a most thrilling effect upon the audience, as did also "Why do the nations," by Mr. Bridson. The choruses throughout were rendered with marked precision and finish, reflecting the highest credit upon Mr. Charles R. Green, the Conductor, for his careful training. An efficient orchestra was engaged, including Mr. T. Harper, who played the trumpet obbligato.

THE return of Mr. William J. Winch, the American tenor, to his own country, after his successful visit to England, has excited the utmost enthusiasm, the principal Boston papers being unanimous in their praise of his exceptionally fine voice and style. His singing at the thirteenth Boston Symphony Concert is thus noticed in the Boston Evening Transcript: "Mr. Winch comes back to us from his English triumphs with the beauty of his voice unimpaired; he stands to-day, as he has stood for some years, as one of the few American singers who show an appreciation of what constitutes style in singing." the Boston Saturday Evening Gazette we read: Winch's style has broadened greatly, and has acquired a deeper warmth, finish, and sincerity since he was last heard here. His singing of all his selections was highly artistic, and was particularly noticeable for its fine phrasing, manliness, and the varied grace of expression and purity of taste that distinguished it." The Boston Sunday Herald says: "The re-appearance of Mr. Winch made quite a notable event, on account of his long absence from Boston Concert Halls, and his great popularity was shown by the cordial greeting given him on his entrance. His singing had all the charm of former days, the same purity of tone, clear intelligent phrasing, and clear enunciation characterising his interpretation of each of his several numbers"; and the Boston Daily Evening Traveller bears testimony to his powers in the following manner: "In the Raff song (' Madchenlied') the style of the singer was magnificent; and the favourite Jensen Lieder was sung with a gracefulness and delicacy of motion that will ever be the envy of all the tenors of the town. Is it not gratifying for any city to own such a singer?"

MISS HOLLAND gave a Concert on the 24th ult., at Grosvenor House (by permission of the Duke of Westminster), in aid of the Dudley Stuart Home for Training Poor Girls for Service. The programme was an interesting one, consisting of Brahms's "Gesang der Parzen" ("Song of the Fates") and of a Cantata by Herr Josef Rheinberger, entitled "Christophorus" ("The Legend of St. Christopher," in the English version), the latter being heard for the first time in England on this occasion. In the rendering of both these works the choral-singing was marked throughout by that refinement and intelligent appreciation of the subject in hand, which we look for in a well-trained choir of English amateurs like Miss Holland's. The solo numbers of the Cantata were likewise interpreted by members of the choir. Herr Rheinberger's "Christophorus" is well suited for a performance on a limited scale, like the present, and while scarcely possessing any distinctive claim for originality, is decidedly interesting. We shall, however, have an opportunity of soon hearing the work again, as Miss Holland will repeat the performance at Apsley House and Grosvenor House, on the 3rd and 5th inst. respectively. Mr. Owen Evan Thomas, a young bass singer (pupil of Signor Lamperti, of Milan), contributed two songs to the programme—" Song of Hybrias the Cretan," by J. W. Elliott; and "The King of Thule," by M. White-in which he displayed a fine voice of exceptional compass and sympathetic timbre, although evidently suffering from a relaxed throat. Mr. Thomas will render a still better account of himself ere long, or we are much mistaken.

The first of a series of three Subscription Chamber Concerts, under the direction of Messrs. Walter Mackway and Charles Stewart Macpherson, was given at the Brixton Hall, on the 17th ult., with much success. The programme, which consisted entirely of works composed between 1750 and 1820, comprised Mozart's Pianoforte Quartet in G minor, No. 1; Beethoven's Sonata in F, Op. 17, for pianoforte and horn; the same master's Pianoforte Trio in E flat, Op. 1, No. 1; Spohr's "Granoforte Trio in E flat, Op. 1, No. 1; Spohr's "Granoforte Trio in E flat, for pianoforte, and songs by Haydn and Schubert. The executants were: violin, Miss Winifred Robinson; viola, Mr. W. H. Hann; violoncello, Mr. J. E. Hambleton; French horn, Mr. C. F. B. Catchpole; pianoforte, Mr. Charles S. Macpherson; vocalist, Miss Hilda Wilson; accompanist, Mr. Alfred Izard. The next Concert, to embrace works composed between 1820 and the present time, will take place on the 3rd inst.

A CONCERT (the fourth of the season) was given on the 19th ult., at Westminster Chapel, by the chapel choir, under the direction of Mr. David Woodhouse. Among the choral numbers of the programme may be mentioned the chorus "O Father, whose Almighty Power," from "Judas Maccabæus," and the "Hallelujah" from "The Messiah"; numerous solo performances, both vocal and instrumental being also included. The Concert, which, on the whole, was of a somewhat "amateurish" type, presented, however, some few features of special interest, including the skilful organ-playing displayed by Mr. W. G. Wood in a Fantasia and Fugue in C major of his own composition. Mr. Wood evidently knows how to write for his instrument, the present Fantasia being a highly effective and at the same time an earnest, musicianlike production. It was duly appreciated and redemanded by the audience, the composer responding by a repetition of the vigorous and cleverly wrought fugal portion of the work. Other instrumental wrought lugar portion of the work. Other installentaries solos were contributed by Messrs. H. C. Tonking (violin and organ) and Mr. J. E. Hambleton (violoncello), Miss Sara Wells, Miss Adelina Fermi, and Mr. Musgrove Tufnail being the solo vocalists. There was a very good attendance.

A PIANOFORTE Recital was held (by invitation) at the Blüthner Pianoforte Rooms, 46, Kensington Gardens Square, on the 6th ult., by Herr Alfred Richter, assisted by Herr Josef Ludwig (violin), Mr. W. E. Whitehouse (violoncello), Miss Beata Francis, and Mr. Walter Clifford (vocalists). Herr Alfred Richter, who, we believe, made his dibut on this occasion before an English audience, is a son of the late professor at the Leipzig Conservatorium, and may therefore be assumed to have been the recipient of a substantial musical education, both as regards the theoretical and practical requirements of his art. Nor did he, on the occasion under notice, fail to render a very satisfactory account of his attainments under such auspices. In pieces by Chopin and Liszt, the pianist displayed a brilliant, albeit as yet somewhat uneven technique, while he also manifested a considerable talent for fluent yet thoughtful writing in several compositions of his own for pianoforte solo. Altogether the performance of this young artist impressed us very favourably, and we heartily wish him every success.

THE Wesleyan Methodist Sunday School Union Metropolitan Festival Choir, gave their first Choral Festival, at Exeter Hall, on Tuesday evening, the 24th ult. The programme had been most judiciously chosen, and consisted of a very fine selection of music. The Choir was exceptionally good, and showed most careful training on the part of the Conductor, Mr. C. J. Dale. The attack was excellent and the enunciation of the words very clear. The sopranos were particularly bright, strong, and fresh. The Choir showed to the greatest advantage when singing the hymns, the effect being grand and imposing; among these, "Unfurl the Christian standard," by Mr. Alfred Rhodes, was very striking, being a bold and effective tune. The solos were ably rendered, those of Miss Fusselle, Mr. John Probert, and Mr. Bayne being especially successful. There was a full attendance, and the arrangements reflected the greatest credit on the management.

THE Annual Concert by the Orchestral band connected with the South London Institute of Music was given at the Surrey Masonic Hall, Camberwell, on January 30. The instrumental portion of the programme included the overture to Rossini's "Semiramide," an "Intermezzo" by W. S. Lambert (conducted by the composer), Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony, and a selection from Verdi's "Il Trovatore." The performance, while manifesting many faults, was praiseworthy as the work of amateurs, who may for the present be advised to be less ambitious. Mr. T. E. Gatehouse acted as leader, also playing solo parts, and Mr. Leonard C. Venables conducted.

The members of St. Mark's (North Audley Street) Choral Society—Conductor, Mr. Thomas Mountain—gave their first Concert for the third season, on Tuesday, the 3rd ult. The programme consisted of Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" and Macfarren's "Christmas." The vocalists were Miss Clara Leighton, Miss Marian Ellis, R.A.M., and Mr. Henry Piercy. Miss Davis presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. W. Bolton at the harmonium.

A MISCELLANEOUS Concert was given at St. Peter's Hall, Brockley, by the choir of St. Peter's Church, on Tuesday, January 27, in aid of the funds for improving the organ. A new setting of the 13th Pealm "By the waters of Babylon" by the Conductor, Dr. C. J. Frost, was successfully produced. The work comprises an opening chorus, "By the waters," a tenor solo "For they that led us away," sung by Mr. H. J. Bremley, a soprano and contralto due "If I forget thee, O Jerusalem," most effectively rendered by Miss Pierpoint and Miss Bocquet, a bass solo "If I do not remember thee," sung by Mr. H. C. Thomas, a quintet "Remember the children of Edom," beautifully sung by Miss Russell and the four vocalists already named, which was encored, and a chorus "Blessed shall he be."

On Tuesday, the 3rd ult., an Invitation Concert was given at the Norwood Institute by the pupils of the Rev. W. C. Rodgers, Hawtree House School, West Dulwich. The first part of the programme consisted of Cowen's "Rose Maiden," the orchestral accompaniment being by amateurs, with professional help. The Canata was well rendered, the "Wedding" Chorus being encored. The soprano solos were efficiently sung by Master Ernest Knott (who possesses a good voice and method) the tenor and bass parts being well sustained by Messrs. Rodda and Carter. Every number in the work was received with the greatest applause by the large audience. The second part was headed by Gluck's Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," and included several songs and glees. The Concert was conducted by Mr. E. A. Pole, assistant master.

The first number of the Quarterly Musical Review, published in Manchester, and edited by Dr. Hiles, commences with the usual Introduction declaring that the work is especially established to supply a want. Whilst cordially wishing every success to the new venture, we cannot but think that the Editor affirms too much when he assumes that no journal exists in which "all musical questions may be carefully considered, and by which all efforts for the advancement of musical culture may be forwarded." Plenty of room, however, can be found for more workers in the cause; and as all the papers in the opening number are ably written, the Quarterly Musical Review—which is avowedly the organ of the "Society of Professional Musicians"—may take a fair place amongst the number of periodicals devoted to the art.

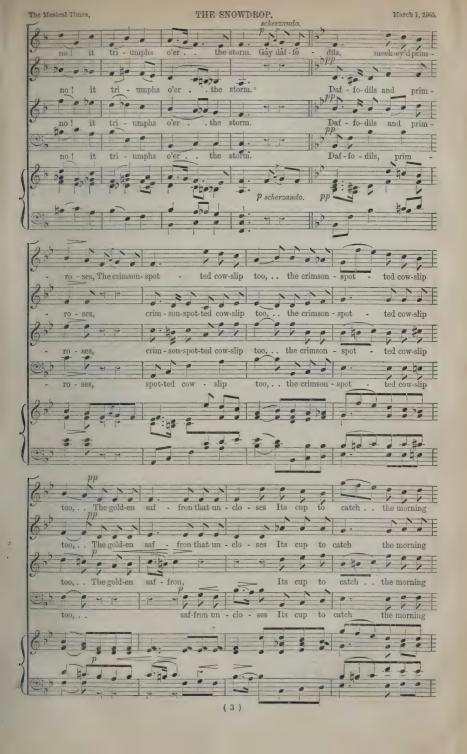

THE Annual Concert of the Violin Classes at the Birkbeck Institute, under the direction of Mr. Fitzhenry, took place on the 14th ult. The selections played by the classes formed of course the chief features of interest, and these comprised an arrangement of "Der Freischütz," Minuet (Handel), "Mignon" Gavotte (Thomas), and National Airs (S. Jarvis). The vocalists—Miss K. Fusselle, Miss Marian McKenzie, Mr. Arthur Thompson, and Mr. Thurley Beale—were much appreciated in their several selections; and Mr. T. E. Gatehouse won much applause for his violin solos. Mrs. Fitzhenry and Mr. A. E. Izard played a pianoforte duet. Mr. Charles Fry recited "The Minstrel's Curse," a ballad for declamation with pianoforte accompaniment by F. Corder, with much success, and contributed two humorous recitations in the second part. Messrs. A. E. Izard and H. S. Webster acted as accompaniests.

THE Kyrle Choir gave a performance of "St. Paul," in Shoreditch Parish Church, on January 28. The soloists were Mrs. Spilling, Miss George, Mr. Reginald Groome, and Mr. Pelham Rooff. On the 11th ult. the Choir sang Mendelssohn's "Hear my prayer," the "Dies Irae" (Mozart), and Spohr's "Last Judgment," in Stepney Meeting House. The soloists were, Miss Amy Aylward, Miss Clotilde Kapff, Mr. Henry Yates, and Mr. R. E. Miles. Mr. E. H. Turpin accompanied on the organ, and Mr. Malcolm Lawson conducted on both occasions.

THE Marlborough Choral Society gave the sixth Concert of the present season on Tuesday January 27, at St. Peter's Hall, Chelsea. Handel's "Messiah" was the work chosen for performance. The solos were admirably given by Miss Patti Winter, Miss Augusta Piffin, Mr. Brackstone Smith, and Mr. Joseph Catten, and the choruses were equally well sung by the Choir, under the direction of Mr. T. R. Macrow, the Conductor.

LONDON: NOVELLO, EWER AND CO.

M. GUILMANT received an enthusiastic welcome from a large audience at the Bow and Bromley Institute on Saturday, the 14th ult., where his fine playing was fully appreciated. For the theme of his improvisation M. Guilmant selected "The Soldiers' Chorus" from "Faust," and upon this being encored played Lemmens's Pastorale in F. An encore was also accorded to his rendering of a Musette by Rameau; another notable feature being M. Guilmant's own Sonata in D minor, which was given for the first time. Mr. Bingley Shaw, from Southwell Cathedral, proved himself the possessor of a bass voice of considerable range, and made a favourable impression, three of his four songs being encored.

An excellent Concert was given on the roth ult., under the patronage of the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor, at the Schoolrooms, New Church Road, Camberwell, by Mr. G. Augustus Holmes, Organist of St. George's Church. The programme included quartets, excellently played by Messrs. Hannex, A. Gambier Holmes, F. C. Preston, and G. Augustus Holmes, one of which, "The Ceremonial March," composed by Mr. Holmes, elicited the heartiest expressions of approbation. The artists were Madame Lansdell-Sims, Miss Meta Russell, Miss Winterton, Mr. George Hunt, Mr. C. A. White, Mr. James Budd, and Mr. Seymour Smith, and the accompanists, Mr. Horace Petley, L.A.M., Mr. Seymour Smith, and Mr. G. Augustus Holmes.

A REMARKABLY fine performance of "The Creation" was given by the Borough of Hackney Choral Association on Monday, the 23rd uit. The great improvement in Mr. Prout's choir was further evidenced, and it is impossible to imagine the choruses better sung. Mrs. Hutchinson rendered the soprano airs with exquisite taste, and an extremely favourable impression was made in the tenor music by Mr. Holberry Hagyard. This gentleman possesses a voice of excellent quality, and sings with such purity of style as to lead us to anticipate that he may shortly win a high position in the concert-room. The bass music was satisfactorily interpreted by Mr. R. Hilton. There was a crowded and most enthusiastic audience.

At the first Examination for the Degree of Bachelor in Music, at the University of Oxford, the following have satisfied the examiners: J. S. Barry, B.A., St. Edmund Hall and York: G. W. Barton, Turrell's Hall; J. H. Crosby, Queen's College and Ely; J. E. Green, Christ Church and Stroud; P. M. T. Laing, St. John's College; R. B. Moore, New College and Exete; M. H. Peacock, M.A., Exeter College and Wakefield; W. E. Pitman, Keble College and Penge; T. H. Y. Trotter, B.A., New College. Examiners: Sir F. A. Gore Cjussley, D.Mus., M.A., Christ Church, Professor of Music; C. H. H. Parry, D.Mus., M.A., Exeter College, Choragus; J. Frederick Bridge, D.Mus., Queen's College.

ON January 25 (conversion of St. Paul) a special Service took place at St. Agnes, Kennington, at which a selection from Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," was performed, with full orchestral accompaniments. The regular choir of the church sang the choruses admirably, "Rise up, arise," being rendered with much vigour and spirit. The principal vocalists were Madame Worrell, Miss Emily Himing, Signor Rizzelli, and Mr. Joseph Lynde. Mr. F. Lowden was at the organ, and Mr. W. W. Hedgecock, the Organist and Choirmaster of the church, conducted. Smart's Postlude in D (Allegro Pomposo), arranged for organ and orchestra, brought this most successful service to a conclusion.

MADAME EDITH DANIEL gave her annual Concert at Brixton Hall, on Wednesday evening, the 4th ult., which was most successful. Madame Daniel gained a hearty reception for each of her contributions, and was efficiently supported by Madame Frances Brooke, Miss Annie Matthews, Miss Maud Cooke, Madame Raymond, Mr. E. Dalzell, Mr. James Budd, Mr. H. Horscroft, Mr. S. J. Allbright (violin), and Mr. Turle Lee (accompanist).

MR. LOUIS N. PARKER, of Sherborne, has been appointed English representative of the newly established "Revue Wagnérienne." Mr. Parker will be glad if all notices of Wagnerian performances, lectures, or publications, are sent to him at the above address.

An entertainment was given at the Highbury Athenaum, on the 13th ult., on behalf of the North London Nursing Association for the Poor, when a musical Idyll, entitled "The Gipsies' Halt," was performed. The work was written and the music arranged by Mrs. C. J. Birch, and the characters were sustained by pupils and friends of Mrs. Girling, assisted by Masters Ernest and H. Birch, of St. Paul's Cathedral. The music, which comprised many well-known choruses, &c., was very well sung, and the performance generally very creditable. The band of the Highbury Philharmonic Society, conducted by Dr. J. F. Bridge, played selections between the acts.

MR. W. E. B. KENDALL gave a Concert-Lecture on "The Voice in Speaking and Singing," on the 9th ult., at the Crystal Palace, to an audience including many members of the medical profession. The lecturer explained in detail, by means of coloured diagrams, the construction of the vocal organs, and advocated strongly "deep breathing" to all voice-users; he also deprecated the use of tobacco and stimulants in general, remarking that every stimulant must in turn become a laxative agent. The vocal illustrations were effectively sung by Mr. and Madame Kendall, and Mr. Iver McKay. Mr. Oliver King (pianist to the Princess Louise) presided at the pianoforte.

THE usual Monthly Smoking Concert of the Victoria Glee Club, under the direction of Mr. W. Sexton, was held on Saturday, the 21st ult., at the Victoria Mansions Restaurant, Victoria Street, S.W. The programme comprised: "Down in a flow'ry vale" (Festa), "Fair Flora decks" (Danby), "Hark, the merry Drum" (Krugh), "The Three Chafers" (Truhn), "Discord" (Webbe), "The Beleaguered" (Sullivan), "Peace to the souls of the Heroes," and "Who comes so dark?" (Callcott). Songs were given by Messrs. B. T. Waddams, J. W. Sanderson, B. Thelenberg, and R. W. Heney. Mr. Frank Swinford was the accompanist.

MADAME JEANNETTE PRICE and Miss Nellie Price gave their annual Concert at the Horns Assembly Rooms, Kennington Park, on the 10th ult., under the patronage of Sir William McArthur, M.P. Madame and Miss Price were highly successful in their solos. The other vocalists were Madame Lansdell Sims, Madame A. H. Watkins, Mdlle. Marie Vagnoini, Miss Emily Pritchard, Mr. Edward Mills, Mr. Wakefield Reed, Mr. T. C. Lockley, Mr. G. S. Graham, and Mr. A. G. Pritchard. Pianoforte solos were admirably given by Miss Eleanor Wynne and Miss Annie Crome. There was a very large audience.

In response to the offer by the Phiharmonic Society of a prize of twenty guineas for the best Concert Overture, some ninety overtures were received from all parts of the world. After much trouble and careful examination of these MSS., the prize has been awarded to the composer of a "Dramatic Overture," marked with the motto, "Fortune, all men call thee fickle," which proves to be composed by Herr Gustav Ernest, a Prussian, residing in London. Composers of the unsuccessful works are now invited to apply for their MSS. to the Hon. Sec., Mr. Francesco Berger, 6, York Street, Portman Square, W.

THE second Concert this season of the Clapham Choral Society was given on the 10th ult., at Belmont Hall, under the direction of Mr. Clement Colman. The programme consisted of Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Night" and "13th Psalm," and Schubert's "Song of Miriam." The choir showed careful training, and sang with great brilliancy and precision. The soloists were Miss Josephine Cravino, Mr. E. Dalzell, Mr. Henry Blower, and Master Frank Charlton, whose rendering of the parts assigned to them tended very materially to make the Concert a decided success.

The performance by The Sacred Harmonic Society of Handel's fine Oratorio "Belshazzar," announced to take place at St. James's Hall, on Friday, the 27th ult., was too late for notice in our present number. As it is many years since the work was heard in London, its revival by the Sacred Harmonic Society in commemoration of the bicentenary of Handel's birth, is an event of much interest. The principal vocalists promised are Miss Annie Marriott, Miss Chester, Madame Patey, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Bridson; Conductor, Mr. Charles Hallé.

HERR HERMANN FRANKE, in his "arrangements for the season," announces that the Richter Concerts will commence at St. James's Hall, on Monday, May 4, and that nine performances will be given. He also promises, at Prince's Hall, Piccadilly, three Chamber Concerts, at which the celebrated "Heckmann Quartet" will appear. The dates named for these Concerts are the 26th ult., the 3rd and 10th inst. A short season of German Opera is said to be "in contemplation"; but the carrying out of this design will depend upon the amount of support forthcoming.

THE Examination for the Degree of Doctor in Music, at the University of Oxford, and the second Examination for the Degree of Bachelor in Music, will be holden in October next. For the last-named Examination, in addition to the usual subjects, there will be required a critical knowledge of Spohr's "Last Judgment," full score; and Mozart's Symphony in D, known as "The Prague Symphony," foll score. All exercises are to be sent to the Professor of Music, Sir Frederick A. Gore Ouseley, St. Michael's, Tenbury, as early as possible. None can be received after the end of June.

On Wednesday Evening, the 4th ult., at the Church of St. Andrew, Stockwell, the choir augmented by that of the St. Andrew's Choral Society, sang very effectively the Christmas Music from the "Messiah," commencing with the Recitative "Behold a Virgin," and ending with the Chorus "Glory to God." Dusing the offertory the "Hallelujah" Chorus was exceedingly well rendered. The conductor was Mr. R. Felix Blackbee, Organist and Choirmaster of the Church, and Conductor of the St. Andrew's Choral Society, his pupil Mr. Frederick Williams presiding at the Organ.

On the 17th ult., the members of the Euston Glee Union gave their second Smoking Concert of the season, at Euston Station, when a very attractive miscellaneous programme was provided; the part-songs, "I heard the bells in distant greeting" (Isenmann) and "The Beleaguered" (Sullivan), eliciting special marks of approval from a large and appreciative audience. The songs were very efficiently given by members of the Union; Mr. J. Jones ably presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. Stephen Kilbey was the Conductor. The next Concert will take place on Monday, April 13.

At the weekly Concert at Whitefield's Tabernacle on the 24th ult, the bi-centenary of Handel's birth was marked by the programme being devoted to the master's compositions. The soloists were Madame Minnie Gwynne, Miss Mary Thomas, Mr. Arthur Thompson, and Mr. Frank May, who rendered acceptably airs from "The Messiah;" "Judas," "Jephtha," "Samson," &c. The Concert was under the direction of Mr. Arthur Dorey, who played, as organ solos, Overture "Occasional Oratorio," and Concerto in F.

At the Second Conversazione of the Artists' and Amateurs' Society, held at the Prince's Hall Galleries, on Tuesday the 24th ult., a high class programme was performed under the direction of Mr. Avalon Collard. Mrs. Brereton, (Miss Ambler) and Mr. Harper Kearton were the vocalists, and the programme included Grieg's Sonata in F for violin and pianoforte (by Herr Andreas Pettersson and Mr. C. W. Perkins), and a Trio for violin, pianoforte, and organ (Mr. Avalon Collard), "Melodie Religieuse," by Berthold Tours.

An Organ Recital was given at St. John's Parish Church, Hackney, on Tuesday evening, the 17th ult., by Mr. Arthur Trickett, F.C.O., the Organist. The instrument has three manuals, thirty-one stops, the diapasons being very fine. It is a G organ, but C pedals were substituted a few years ago. The programme comprised Sonata No. 6 (Mendelssohn), Andante (Wesley), Larghetto, Second Symphony in D (Beethoven), Prelude and Fugue in E (Bach), Alla Pastorale (Smart), and Offertoire in G (Wely).

Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" was given at Union Chapel, Islington, on the 27th ult., under the direction of Mr. Williamson. The solo artists were Miss Agnes Larkcom, Miss Rose Dafforne, Mr. John Probert and Mr. Bridson. Mr. Fountain Meen presided at the organ.

In addition to the special performance of "The Rose of Sharon" at St. James's Hall, on the 20th inst., the work will be given by the choir of the Bow and Bromley Institute, under the direction of Mr. W. G. McNaught, on the 10th inst. It will also be heard at Glasgow, on the 17th; Newcastle-on-Tyne, 24th; and Arbroath and Dundee, 30th and 31st. The first performance in New York, under Mr. Theodore Thomas, has been unavoidably postponed until April.

The Wood Green and Bowes Park Choral Society gave their second Concert of the season, at the Masonic Hall, on Tuesday evening, the zyth ult.; the programme consisting of Barnett's "Ancient Mariner" and a miscellaneous selection. The principal vocalists were Madame Clara West, Miss Edith Kelly, Miss Kate Coldrey, Mr. G. Micklewood, and Mr. James Bayne; pianoforte, Mr. A. J. Hadrill; harmonium, Mr. C. E. Milner; Conductor, Mr. Plant Coldrey.

The Bolingbroke Choral Society, Wandsworth Common, gave the second Concert this season at the Bolingbroke Hall on Shrove Tuesday, when Gade's "Erl King's daughter" was rendered with considerable success. The solos were entrusted to Mrs. Wood, R.A.M., Miss Nellie Dakin, Mr. Harry Hast, and Mr. F. Bevan. The miscellaneous items included songs by the above-named artists, and part-songs. Miss Lottle Gregory accompanied and Mr. Edgar Adams conducted.

The members of the Lavender Hill Choral Society gave a successful Amateur Concert at St. Matthew's Room on the 3rd ult. A large number of members, including Miss Jekyll, Miss Woodhams, and Messrs. C. and J. Ortner, contributed to the programme. Several part-songs were well rendered by the choir, especially "The Vikings," which received a well merited encore. Mr. J. R. Jekyll conducted, and the accompaniments were played by Miss Bird and Miss Stark.

The second Annual Entertainment of Causton's Athletic Club was given at the South Place Institute, Finsbury, on Saturday, the 14th ult, when a highly interesting programme was provided. The solo vocalists were Misses Maud Cameron and Clara Myers, Messrs. Vincent Ives, Tom Maude, Charles Rowcliffe, R. N. Baxter, and H. P. Matthews. Instrumentalists, Messrs. F. Abernethy and J. Collings (piano), and H. Wilson (cornet). Part-songs by the Crystal Glee Union were also given with much effect.

A VERY Successful Concert was given at the Royal Victoria Coffee Hall, Waterloo Road, on Thursday, the 5th ult., under the direction of Madame Clara West. Madame West was assisted by Miss Jeanie Rosse, Miss Rose Dafforne, Mr. Frederick Williams, Mr. Bell, and Mr. Lovett King, vocalists; violinist, Mr. Arthur Payne; pianist, Mr. W. West; and the band of the 7th Surrey Rifles.

AT St. Luke's Church, Chelsea, on the 8th ult., after Evensong, Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," Part I., was performed, accompanied by full orchestra, the soli being very ably taken by Mrs. North Home (née Wardroper), Miss Pattie Michie, Mr. Courtice Pounds, and Mr. Musgrove Tufnail, under the direction of Mr. Everard Hulton, Mus. B., Oxon.

WE have much pleasure in announcing that Mr. Joseph Bennett has returned to England, much improved in health, and that he will resume his articles upon the "Great Composers" in our next number. Our readers, however, will be glad to see that in our present issue he gives us the first instalment of a series of papers recording his impressions of the state of music in America.

A CONCERT was given to the patients of the Brompton Hospital on Tuesday evening, the 17th ult., by Miss Patti Winter, who contributed two songs with much effect. The other artists were Miss Grosvenor Gooch, Miss E. Caverhill-Shiels, Mrs. R. C. Drew, Mr. Patrick Hayes, and Mr. W. Stanhope Clarke. Mr. William Carter conducted.

THE Finchley Choral Society gave a performance, on the 5th ult., of Cowen's "Rose Maiden," under the direction of Mr. A. A. Yeatman. The vocalists were Miss Fusselle, Miss Clara Myers, Mr. John Probert, and Mr. James Bayne.

MR. Tobias A. Matthay gave a very successful Pianoforte Recital, at Clapham Hall, on the 5th ult., his programme comprising pieces by Liszt, Schumann, Brahms, Chopin, Weber, and two of his own compositions, all of which were played from memory. Mr. Hutchinson was the vocalist, and Mr. E. Fond accompanied.

A SECOND Oratorio performance, consisting of Haydn's "Creation," took place at the Victoria Hall, on Ash Wednesday, before a large audience. There was a full band and chorus, and the solo vocalists were Miss Beata Francis, Mr. Hanson, and Mr. Alfred J. Layton. Mr. H. A. Evans conducted.

Mr. George Dixey, of 8, Warwick Street, W., has been appointed Secretary to the Music Publishers' Association, in place of Mr. Lawrence Harris, resigned. It has been resolved by the Association to discontinue the publication of the Quarterly List of New Music which has for some time past appeared in THE MUSICAL TIMES.

MR. CARL ARMBRUSTER announces a course of five Lectures on "The Life, Theory, and Works of Richard Wagner," commencing on Saturday, the 28th ult., with vocal and instrumental illustrations, at the Royal Institution, Albemarle Street.

An Organ Recital will be given by Mr. C. E. Miller at the church of St. Augustine and St. Faith, Old Change, on each Thursday during the present month, commencing at 1.15 p.m. and lasting for about three-quarters of an hour.

BACH'S Passion Music will be sung at St. Paul's Cathedral at the special service on the last day of the present month, Tuesday, the 31st inst., at 7 p.m.

BACH's Passion Music (according to St. Matthew) will be sung by an augmented choir, with organ accompaniment, at St. Peter's Church, Eaton Square, on the last two Wednesdays in Lent, at 8 p.m.

THE 145th Anniversary Festival of the Royal Society of Musicians is fixed to take place at St. James's Hall on Thursday, May 7. Mr. Charles Santley will be the President of the day.

"A HISTORY OF PIANOFORTE MUSIC," by Mr. Gillmore, with an Introductory Preface by Mr. Ridley Prentice, will be shortly published by Messrs. W. Swan Sonnenschein and Co.

Examinations in practical music will be held in May next by the Society of Professional Musicians. The harmony examinations of the Society are held in all parts of the country annually, on the third Saturday in June.

MISS MADELINE HARDY gave a highly successful and excellent Concert at Brixton Hall, on Tuesday evening, the

A FESTIVAL in aid of the Choir Benevolent Fund will be held in Norwich early in June.

REVIEWS.

Symphony No. 4 (the Welsh), in B flat minor. For Orchestra. By Frederic H. Cowen. Full score. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE publication of the full score of a symphony, comparatively common in Germany, is rare enough in this country to deserve remark. In the case of the present work nobody will be disposed to grudge Mr. Cowen his well earned honour. When the "Welsh" symphony was first produced last season at one of the concerts of the Philharmonic Society it was at once pronounced a worthy companion to the same composer's "Scandinavian" symphony in C minor, and the opinion formed after a single hearing is amply confirmed by a careful examination of the published score. True, there are a few points in the work that we could wish otherwise; for example, we think that more contrast would have been secured had the finale not been in the same tempo (3-4) as the opening allegro; and again in the "free fantasia" of the first movement the second subject receives somewhat more than its due share of attention, though the theme is so charming in itself that we cannot wonder at Mr. Cowen's dwelling lovingly upon feeling, and they in no way affect the merits of the symphony, which is not only a representative work, but an honour to English art.

In examining the score our attention is naturally chiefly attracted to the orchestration. Here we must first congratulate Mr. Cowen on his moderation in the use of the brass. Though scored for the modern full orchestra, with four horns and three trombones, the work is never noisy. In the second and third movements the trombones are not used at all; and even in the first allegro they are very sparingly introduced. The four horns, on the contrary, are very freely employed, Mr. Cowen (we think wisely) availing himself of the enlarged resources given to the instrument by the use (now almost universal) of the ventils. This modern method of writing for the horns, of which excellent examples will be found in the scores of Brahms and Wagner, gives great richness and sonority to the middle of the orchestra. In his treatment of the wood wind Mr. Cowen is most felicitous; he thoroughly understands the capabilities of each instrument, both separately and in combination. The second and third movements of the symphony abound in beautiful touches of colouring obtained by a few notes judiciously introduced. The only point of instrumentation in which we differ from Mr. Cowen is the treatment of the drums, which he (like Rossini, in "Guillaume Tell") frequently uses in chords of which the drum notes form no part. For instance, on p. 7, bar 10, we find the drum in B flat on the chord of the dominant seventh of D flat. Of course, if the drums are simply used as rhythmical instruments there is nothing to be said against it; but as our best performers can get a perfectly distinct note from the instrument, it is plain that the B flat must produce a dissonant effect in the chord. This again is a matter as to which composers differ in their procedure. We confess to a preference for the method adopted by Beethoven and Mendelssohn, who rarely, if ever, employ the drums excepting as parts of the harmony. We have only to add that the score is beautifully engraved and printed in the best German style.

Ten Songs. The Poetry by Robert Burns. The Music composed by George J. Bennett. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

A DOUBLE interest attends the appearance of works om the pen of Mr. G. J. Bennett. There is the interest from the pen of Mr. G. J. Bennett. arising from what they are per se, and, also, that connected with the indications they afford of his growing powers and future development. We all know enough of the young man to feel sure that he is the happy possessor of uncommon gifts; the only question is whether, in after years, he will justify the discretion of nature in bestowing them. Disappointments in this regard are not amon. Will Mr. Bennett add one to their number? That is the point about which amateurs acquainted with his possibilities feel concern. The songs before us are, of the point about which is possibilities feel concern. The songs before us are, of the possibilities feel contribution to evidence in the case, but, as far as they go, their testimony is assuring. It takes a musician to write a simple ditty which shall have in it a spirit and a charm that draw attention from and give pleasure to learned and unlearned alike. This is the characteristic of the pieces before us. Mr. Bennett has been careful not to ignore the features of Scottish melody, many of the inflections of which he uses. They are, however, not presented in a crude form, but in the shape they would take after passing through the laboratory of the artist-musician. Thus they give piquancy and, so to speak, "local colour" to songs which have a value of their own apart from them. In respect of structure, we are glad to see that Mr. Bennett preserves an appropriate simplicity. The modern song is often a heavy and laboured pianoforte piece with a vocal accompaniment. This is not the case here, though never does the pianoforte part want distinctiveness of character or the pianoforte part want distinctiveness of character or directness of purpose. The poems treated by Mr. Bennett are "O were my love you lilac fair," "O, my luve is like the red, red rose," "It is na, Jean," "Thou hast left me," "Wilt thou be my dearie?" "Come, let me take thee," "Here is the glen," "My ain kind dearie! O," "Bonnie wee thing," and "I love my Jean." We do not claim perfect equality of interest and charm for the ten settings, but all are good, without exception, and some are specially 1. These, however, are merely matters of opinion and beautiful. In the second category we place "O were my love." "Thou hast left me ever," and "Here is the glen." No musician will examine this set of songs without recognising in them an important contribution to a class of works in which, as regards this country, there is ample room for improvement.

Vier Lieder für Mezzo-Soprano, mit Begleitung des Pianoforte. Deutscher und Englischer Text. Componirt von Battison Haynes. Op. 8. [Leipzig: Fr. Kistner.]

It is only a few months since we had occasion to speak favourably in these columns of some instrumental pieces by Mr. Haynes. We meet with him here essaving another department of his art, and with no less success than attended his previous efforts. With the rare exceptions in which a pronounced individuality of style is early developed, every young composer must to a greater or less extent be influenced by the musical life surrounding him. Mr. Haynes has for some years studied at the Leipzig Conservatoire, in the very centre of the activity of the New German school. It would therefore be more than surprising did we not find in these songs traces of his study of and sympathy with the works of Schumann, Brahms, and, perhaps more than either, Wagner. In saying this we intend no insinuation of imitation, still less of plagiarism; but Mr. Haynes's vein of thought has evidently been tinged by his knowledge and love of the authors we have named. For many years the star of Mendelssohn was in the ascendant in North Germany; many compositions were published which might be described as "Mendels-sohn and water"—often a great deal of water. It is a significant sign of the change of musical feeling among the present generation of students in Germany that not the slightest trace of the Mendelssohn influence is to be found in Mr. Haynes's songs.

The first number of the present collection, "Vorsatz" (a Vow), is one of the most successful. The composer has happily caught the spirit of his words, and produced a really charming little song. The chromatic harmony, in which Mr. Haynes indulges very freely, is treated with thorough technical knowledge, the modulation from the dominant of D major to D flat at the words "Du selber sollst es sehen," being especially good. No. 2 (" Gute Nacht"), somewhat quieter in style, is hardly less effective. The following song, "Das Haidekind" (The Child of the Heath), is less striking; but the last number "Das Mädchen spricht" (A Maiden's Request) is not only a complete contrast to the rest of the set, showing the composer in a sportive, semi-humorous vein, but is full of grace and piquancy. The pianoforte accompaniments to all the songs, though not exactly difficult, require careful and finished playing, being mostly quite independent of the voice parts. On the whole we can warmly recommend these songs, and congratulate Mr. Haynes on the musician-

Hymns and Choruses for Church Missions. [Marshall Brothers.]

This collection, issued under the auspices of the Church Army, must be taken as a fresh evidence of the spread of religious "militarism." Of the merits or demerits of this system it is not our province to speak. But we may be allowed to state our belief that the attempt to graft the childish familiarity of the negro, in dealing with sacred subjects, on to the minds of the lower strata of our complex society is a most dangerous experiment. The effect, at any rate on a cultivated mind, of divorcing secular melodies from their context, in order to link them to these crude, emotional, interjectional expressions of religious aspiration, is to produce a sort of intellectual nausea. Such a procedure is a radical abnegation of the fundamental canons of musical The music contained in this book, beyond some familiar English hymn-tunes, may be roughly classed under three heads. The first comprises a number of rousing, rollicking airs, with strongly marked rhythms. These are, in the bulk of cases, obviously American, and composed expressly for the words. Secondly, we come across a great number of familiar tunes, inextricably associated to us with other words, such as the Scotch melodies the origin of the Cantatas; and many of the admirers of the composer, including the late Sir W. S. Bennett, to whom they were shown, were previously unaware of their March of the Men of Harlech," "Oh, who will o'er the existence. The "Coffee Cantata" commences with a downs so free "; several lively German Volkslieder, and a sprinkling of hackneyed music-hall favourites. Thirdly, we find a certain proportion of famous secular airs by classical writers adapted for the purpose in hand. From an artistic point of view, no language is strong enough to brand this practice. We have come across several songs by Mendelssohn-at least one of his four-part songs-Schubert's "Adieu," and Bach's "Willst du dein Herz mir schenken"—all "adapted" for the Church Army; that is to say, with their beautiful outlines mutilated and vulgarised. "Alterations in a great work, if they are required," it has been well said, "should come from above, never from below. As a matter of fact, they do not seem to come from above, but from below, and very perpendicularly below too." Even in some of our best churches signs are not wanting of a leaning towards the emotional, not to say the hysterical, in the choice of hymn-tunes. that our national reserve and moderation may help to resist this tendency, which, by exercising a debasing influence on music, the great handmaid of religion, cannot fail to alienate from the services of the Church those cultivated and artistic minds who might otherwise have been retained within her pale.

In the Tyrol. Three Characteristic Pieces for the Pianoforte. Composed by Wilfred Bendall.

[Forsyth Brothers.] With the exception of No. 1, "Zillerthal," a Tyrolienne, we can scarcely see any justification for the title of this series of pieces, No. 2 being a Rêverie, and No. 3 a Barcarole. Certainly the compositions might as well have been written in the Tyrol as in any other part of the world; but we cannot discover what is usually termed "local colour" sufficiently to identify them with the spot chosen. Musically speaking, there is much merit in these Sketches; No. 2, which has an extremely graceful principal subject, being perhaps the best of the three. All the passages lie well under the hand, and the pieces will well repay the student for the practice which they demand. We know that composers differ in their notation; but what can Mr. Bendall mean by writing what we should term an inversion of a diminished seventh, with A sharp in the right hand, and B flat in the left, in the third bar of the Barcarole?

A Battle Song. Part-song, with Pianoforte Accompaniment. Words by Mrs. R. Cooke. Music by E. A. Sydenham. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

In this Part-song Mr. Sydenham has given us a vivid musical picture of the movement of an army across the desert, the night attack and victory, and the thanksgiving for the success of our troops; the incidents of which, we need hardly say, will recall to the recollection of all hearers one of our recent military achievements, although no names, either of persons or places, are mentioned. There are some effective changes of time and key throughout the song, one point especially worthy of commendation being the alteration to the tonic major on the words "The rebel fire they quickly hush"; and we may also draw attention to the clever use of the theme of the National Anthem, in common time, which is woven into the final chorus. The pianoforte accompaniment is an essential part of the composition; and a harmonium part, which is also published, will certainly materially enhance the effect of the song in performance.

Bach's Comic Cantatas. Edited by Samuel Reay, Mus. Bac., Oxon. [Weekes and Co.]

THE Editor of these interesting works tells us in his Preface that they were "first published in Germany by Crantz, of Berlin, sometime subsequent to the year 1842, under the editorship of S. W. Dehn, an industrious musician 'who,' according to Grove's 'Dictionary of Music and Musicians,' 'scored no less than 500 motetts of Orlando Musicians, and copied for the press an enormous number of works by J. S. Bach,' to say nothing of other similar labours in which he was unremittingly engaged up to the time of his death in 1858." Little seems to be known of the origin of the Cantatas; and many of the admirers of dialogue between a father and daughter on the subject of drinking coffee, the old gentleman insisting upon it that she shall never have a husband until she abandons her favourite beverage; and although the daughter seems to give way upon this point, it is evident that it is with a mental reservation. The "Peasant's Cantata" contains a number of vocal pieces sung in praise of a Lord of the Manor and his family, by his tenants, during a village fête, the recitatives and airs, though only given to two voices, being probably, as Mr. Reay suggests, intended to be sung by several persons. Many of the numbers in both these Cantatas are not only excellent in themselves, but full of dramatic feeling. In the first-named, a soprano air, "Ah, to-day," and much of Schlendrian's music; and in the second, the bass song, "Come, let us be joyful," and a soprano solo, "There is nought on earth so fair," are so striking that we cannot but wonder that we never hear them in the Concert-room. To the great credit of the committee of the Bow and Bromley Institute, and Mr. W. G. McNaught (Conductor of the Institute Choir), these Cantatas were produced in 1879, for the first time in this country, when the parts were supported by Mrs. Daglish (of Newark), Mr. Sydney Tower, and Mr. Frederic King.

Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in E flat. Cantate Domino and Deus Misereatur in C. By G. F. Cobb. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

In the first of these services the nineteenth century may be said to shake hands with the sixth. In other words, Gregorian phrases alternate with passages to which a modern flavour is given, no doubt designedly, by the use of triple measure, simple and compound. At the first blush the union may seem ill assorted, but in performance the effects of contrast, though peculiar, are far from unpleasing. The setting is mainly unisonal, for men and boys alternately, two-part writing only occurring in the "Gloria." The Cantate, &c., is wholly unisonal, and there is a preface in which Mr. Cobb sets forth the desirability of using this form more largely in Church music. It would occupy too much space to quote his arguments, but we gladly admit their force, and invite the attention of organists and choirmasters to them. The service itself is very pleasing and melodious, and a great deal of musicianly skill is exhibited in the accompaniment.

Only to love thee once again. Song. Words and Music by George H. L. Edwards. [Novello, Ewer and Co.].

Mr. Edwards has a decided feeling for melody, and his harmonies are appropriately unpretentious; but he has evidently a passion for doubling notes which are too sensitive for such treatment; and, moreover, often writes his chords awkwardly for the hands; as, for example, in the last bar of page two. The song, which we presume is intended for a high tenor, will, however, doubtless prove effective, if sung with the fervour which both words and music demand.

Fleurette. Song. Words by Frederick E. Weatherly. When day is dying. Song. Words by Clement J. Glenister. Music by H. A. Muscat. [Edwin Ashdown.]

THE composer of these songs gives a graceful colouring to the words he has chosen; but it seems strange how many of those who devote themselves to writing vocal pieces appear to name the notes of their harmonies by ear instead of by rule. In "Fleurette," for instance, we have the major third of the supertonic harmony in the second bar E flat, and in the third bar D sharp. This should not be with one who has evident musical tendencies, especially as we have little fault to find with the harmonies them-selves. "When day is dying," although having a some-what conventional melody, will, no doubt, from its ease and simplicity, please more than the first-named song.

Albumblatt. For the Pianoforte. Composed by Frederick F. Rogers. [A. Cox.]

MR. Rogers has here given us an unpretentious little Sketch, which will certainly prove acceptable to amateur pianists. The subjects are extremely melodious, and some figures in the accompaniment lift the composition beyond the level of ordinary drawing-room pieces.

FOREIGN NOTES.

THE bi-centenary of the birth of Handel has been celebrated, with more or less éclat, in various parts of Germany last month. At Halle, where the composer was born, on February 23, 1685, and where a statue was erected to him in 1859, much enthusiasm was displayed on the occasion of this notable anniversary. A correspondent of the Standard, under date February 22, reports as follows concerning the Halle celebration: "The Festival, which is munificently patronised by the local authorities, has attracted large numbers of visitors from all parts of Germany, as well as from abroad. Among the principal performers are some of the first singers of Germany, while the choruses are entrusted to two of the most celebrated choral Societies of the country. The work chosen for the preliminary performance to night was the Secular Oratorio of 'Hercules.' The bass part of Hercules was sung by Herr Stange, of Berlin; while Fräulein Hahn impersonated the part of Dejanira, and Herr von der Meden that of Hyllos. Dr. Homeyer, of Leipzig, accompanied the recitatives on the organ. The performance was perfect, and produced a deep impression on a crowded and brilliant audience. To-morrow being the anniversary of the composer's birth, the Festival will open at mid-day with an al fresco ceremony in front of Handel's monument in the Market Place. The statue itself has already received an additional adornment in the shape of a most artistic iron railing in which floral decorations are intertwined with lyres and other ornaments in a most graceful manner. After this railing has been formally handed over to the municipal authorities, the choral societies, accompanied by the orchestra, will sing one or two choruses from 'Judas Maccabæus.' The oration of the day will then be delivered, and will be followed by the performance of the march from 'Joshua' by the wind instruments. At six o'clock a grand performance of 'The Messiah' will be given, without any omission. The principal soloists will be Herren Betz and Alvary, of the Berlin and Weimar operas, Fräulein Spies, of Wiesbaden, and Madame Otto, of Dresden. The orchestra will comprise the band of the celebrated Gewandhaus Concerts, of Leipzig, together with that of the city of Halle." Similar Handel celebrations have taken place in several other prominent German towns.
As already indicated in our "Notes," the annual Festival of the Lower Rhine, to be held this year at Aachen (Aixla-Chapelle), will take the form of a commemoration of the joint bi-centenary of the birth of Bach and Handel. Festival is to take place at Whitsuntide, the principal Conductor being Herr Reinecke, of Leipzig; assisted by Herr Julius Kniese, music director of Aachen. The following somewhat miscellaneous programme is being contemplated at present, viz.: First day: Chorus, "Ehre sei Gott in der Höhe," from "Christmas Oratorio" (Bach); "Judas Maccabæus" (Handel). Second day: Easter "Judas Maccabeus" [Handel]. Second day: Easter Cantata (Bach), Symphony C minor (Beethoven), selection from "Alexander's Feast" (Handel); "Prometheus," symphonic poem (Liszt); Finale from "Die Meistersinger" (Wagner). Third day: Overture, "Manfred" (Reinecke); Finale from "Loreley" (Mendelssohn); Symphony, D minor (Schumann); "Hallelujah," from "Messiah" (Handel). Among the soloists already secured are Herren Joachim, Gudehus, and Siehr, and Fräulein Spies, of Wiesbaden.

A commemorative tablet is to be placed against the southern wall of the Johannis-Kirche (St. John's) of Leipzig, where (although the exact spot cannot be absolutely ascertained) the great Johann Sebastian Bach was interred on July 31, 1750.

The German Chancellor, in reply to the petition recently presented to him by an influential committee of German musicians, musical instrument makers, and others, regarding the introduction of a uniform musical pitch for the entire Empire, has promised to use his influence in the desired direction, having already placed himself in communication with the Federal Governments for that purpose.

A grand music Festival, after the model of those annually held at the Lower Rhine, is being organised at Stuttgart, and will take place during the coming summer.

Wagner's "Die Walkure" was produced at the Stuttgart Hof-Theater on the 13th ult., this having been the first opportunity afforded to the audience of the Suabian capital hearing at least a portion of the "Nibelungen Tetralogy, a work long since placed upon the répértoire of every other important operatic stage of the Fatherland, with the exception-mirabile dictu !- of that of its metropolis, Berlin.

Herr Victor Nessler is to have a rival in one Herr Emil Kayser, who has also written an opera on the subject of "Der Trompeter von Säkkingen," which is shortly to be brought out at the Kroll'sche Theater, of Berlin.

It is not the first time that two composers have simultaneously, and independently of each other, hit upon the same subject for the groundwork of a new opera. contemplated an opera founded upon the story of "Freischütz," at the time when Weber prepared the first sketches for his immortal work, but as soon as he heard of his friend and rival's intention, wisely abandoned the project. again read in the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik: "Gold-mark's new opera 'Merlin,' has been completed and handed to the Vienna Opera, where it is first to be brought out. By an extraordinary coincidence, another composer, Herr Philipp Rüfer, of Berlin, has likewise just completed an opera of the same title and subject, without having the least idea of the existence of Herr Goldmark's libretto." The coincidence, as we have seen, is not so extraordinary after all, though rather unfortunate for the last-named composer, who has yet to win his spurs in the operatic world, while Goldmark's reputation is already established.

Madame Martens San Martino, the gifted vocalist, who during her recent stay at Berlin had the honour of singing at the soirée given to the members of the Congo Conference, at the Crown Prince's Palace, where her talents were much appreciated, will, we understand, shortly arrive in London for the season.

The annual meeting of the Allgemeine Deutsche Musikverein will take place this year at Carlsruhe, on which occasion Berlioz's "Requiem," and Liszt's Symphony to Dante's "Divina Commedia" will be included in the programme. Herr Angelo Neumann, the whilom impresario of the London performances of Wagner's "Der Ring des Nibe-lungen," has, it is stated, resigned his position as director of the Bremen Stadt-Theater in favour of a similar post at the German Theatre of Prague.

A new opera, in three acts, entitled "Die Kaiserstochter," by Willem de Haan, was performed on the 1st ult., at the Darmstadt Hof-Theater, where the composer occupies the post of capellmeister. The novelty, which pleased immensely, and the performance of which has been several times repeated, is spoken of in high terms by German critics.

Rubinstein's Biblical opera "Paradise Lost" is to be performed this month by the Philharmonic Society of Pesth, as well as by the Rühl'sche Verein of Frankfort. The same work is likewise to be produced shortly by the Flügel'sche Gesang-verein of Breslau.

On the 13th ult., the anniversary of the death of Richard Wagner, a special performance of "Tristan und Isolde" was given at the Munich Hof-Theater, in the presence of a large audience. The day was likewise commemorated in an impressive manner by the Berlin Wagner-Verein, and numerous other branches of the Association.

A young pianist, Herr Emil Sauer, a native of Hamburg, is just now causing a sensation in German Concert-rooms by his admirable playing, and is generally considered to have a great future before him.

Weber's early opera "Sylvana," in its newly adapted form, wherein it has recently proved so successful at the Hamburg Stadt-Theater, is now making the round of German operatic establishments, being already in course of preparation at the theatres of Leipzig, Cologne, Lübeck, Darmstadt, and Mannheim.

The publication in Paris of the first number of a monthly journal entitled Revue Wagnerienne, places at rest any doubts which may still have existed in some minds as to the reality of the movement in favour of Wagner's music in France. The new journal is the offspring, and will be the organ, of a circle of musical amateurs and littérateurs who constitute a self-styled "Petit Bayreuth" in the French capital, and among whose members are well-known writers, such as M. Catull Mendez, M. Jullien, and others. M. Emilie Dujardin is the chief editor of the new publication, in the prospectus of which the following passage occurs: "With the death of Wagner there is an end to all personal antagonism; no one in any way connected with the art can afford to ignore the works of this master." And again, in the principal article contained in the present number of the Revue, M. Fourcarld, while upholding the national character of French music as distinct from the specifically German type of Wagner's art, recognises in the latter a return to logic and to true humanity. French lyrical dramatists need not imitate those of the new German school, but their works will be greatly benefited by engraftschool, but their works will be greatly benefited by engratiing the incontestably sound principles of that school upontheir own national art. "Wagner," exclaims the editor in another part of the journal, "will conquer one by one all his remaining antagonists." It remains to be seen whether "Petit Bayreuth" will be influential enough tosecure a stage representation of any of the Bayreuth master's works, extracts from which have of late years met with so much appreciation at the leading Concert institutions of the French capital.

Wagner's "Die Meistersinger" is at length to be produced, with the French version of the text, by M. Victor Wilder, in the early part of the present month, at Brussels. The pianoforte score, with the French words, has just been issued by MM. Schott frères, together with a commentary, "Les motifs typiques des Maîtres-Chanteurs," from the pen of M. Camille Benoit.

Our contemporary, Le Ménéstrel, in its issue of the 22nd ult., contains a characteristic letter by Hector Berlioz on the subject of musical art in general and his own artistic faith in particular, which will doubtless be read with interest by the numerous admirers of this eccentric and versatile man of genius. The letter, which is addressed to the editor of a newspaper, is here published for the first time-

The Paris Châtelet Concert of the 22nd ult. was rendered special by its receipts being set apart for the benefit of the proposed monument in honour of Félicien David. The (Beethoven), fragments from "Herculaneum," and an entire performance of "Le Désert" (Félicien David). Conductor

The new directors of the Paris Opéra have decided torenew the engagements of the personnel of that establishment only on condition of its members submitting to a reduction of their respective salaries.

M. Camille Saint-Saëns has composed a dramatic scena, "Les Imprécations de Camille," the text from Corneille's "Les Horaces." The new work, which is written for Mdlle. Caron, is shortly to be performed at a Concert given in the Theatre de la Monnaie, of Brussels.

Miss Amina Goodwin, a young English pianist, has-recently given a most successful Concert at Leyden (Holland), her brilliant technique and earnest artistic feeling, as displayed in Mendelssohn's D minor Concerto and other solo pieces, eliciting the applause both of her audience generally and of the local press organs.

The new Opera House at Nice, erected on the site of the building destroyed by fire some four years since, was inaugurated, on the 8th ult., with a performance of Verdi's

" Aïda."

At the Teatre Salvini, of Florence, a new opera, "Maria," has recently been brought out and obtained a very fair success. The composer is a lady, Signora Irene Morpurgo, a native of Egypt, who conducted the performance in person.

An operetta entitled "Mentore e Calipso," by the Maëstro Nino Rebora, will shortly be produced, for the first time, at the Alfieri Theatre of Turin.

At Strasburg died, at the age of forty-six, Edmond Weber, an able pianist and composer of merit. He was a pupil of his father, Johannes Weber, and the composer of an opera entitled "Rosita," and of a large quantity of pianoforte and chamber music.

The death is also announced at Buda-Pesth, on January 30, of Racz Pali, well known in Hungary as a violinist, conductor, and composer of national music. He was seventy-two years of age. One of his numerous sons succeeds him in the conductorship of his orchestra.

The death is also announced, on the 16th ult., at New York, of Dr. Leopold Damrosch, an event which we notice more in detail in our obituary column.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,-I am sure that Mr. Cummings will not take it amiss if I set him right in three not immaterial errors of fact into which he has fallen in his recent communication to you on Handel Myths.

1. Mr. Cummings attributes inaccuracy to the statement in a newspaper dated April 1835 to the effect that a silver plate was inserted on the Whitchurch organ; whereas the plate may be seen by ocular inspection to be of brass: but in 1847, within my recollection, the present plate was placed upon the organ by my uncle, Mr. Julius Plumer; and therefore the plate spoken of in 1835 must have been a different I never before heard of the silver plate; if the article of February leads to its recovery, this will add to the debt which we owe to Mr. Cummings for his painstaking researches

2. Mr. Cummings has unconsciously misquoted the present inscription itself. The record is not that Handel was organist from 1715, but from 1718 to 1721; and as the denunciation of the inscription is based upon the assumed improbability of Handel having been on the spot at the earlier date, this error goes very near to the root of the accusation.

3. Mr. Cummings says in his February article that "Julius Plumer, who placed the fabulous inscription on the organ, may have met with a copy of Lintern's publication and have built up in his own imagination the absurd romance," &c. I know, as a matter of fact, that my uncle had never seen Lintern's publication; but if he had, that work had only the remotest connection (if any) with the subject matter of the inscription, the tenour of which Mr. Cummings must have forgotten when he wrote the sentence quoted in inverted commas above. In other words, the inscription and the publication of Lintern involve wholly distinct propositions.

I will not venture to take up your space by dealing affirmatively with the question of Handel's connection with Whitchurch. It is probable that combatants having at once more leisure for such polemics and more knowledge of musical lore will raise the gauntlet; but allow me, with great deference, to point out the fallacy of Mr. Cummings's negative conclusion, even admitting his premises to be unimpeachable. Stripped of fringe, his syllogism is this: "Whitchurch was not the duke's domestic chapel. Handel probably played habitually at the domestic chapel after 1720." Therefore, "he did not play habitually at Whitchurch either before or after that date."

We have always known of the Gosport organ, the private chapel, and the rest of it, but I am afraid we have failed to see the inconsistency which Mr. Cummings rather assumes than proves.

I trust that no word of mine may be taken to imply any want of appreciation of Mr. Cummings's mode of ventilating legend, a mode bracing and healthy, though the wish to " dissipate the fond imaginings of enthusiastic Handelians" may sound at first a little hardhearted. Least of all should I cavil at the unearthing of "a gentleman here" (I confess unknown to me before this introduction), though, by the way, we hardly wanted his ghost to prove that two buildings, half a mile apart, were not identical. The imaginative account of this amusing spectre raises, to any one very familiar with the locus in quo, the inference that the great Duke combined with his other noble attributes a lavish hospitality, of which "a gentleman here" had too freely partaken. The description of the chapel so exactly fits the church as to suggest a post-prandial confusion between the two; the "mountain," which before the memory of the oldest inhabitant begins, had vanished without even bringing forth the traditional mouse; the avenue a mile long, and the droll spelling of Legarr, point to the same conclusion. We have Pope's authority, in his essay on False Taste," for the true spelling, Laguerre.
I remain, Sir, Your obedient Servant,

Edgware, N.W., February 12, 1885. E. CUTLER.

[The plate in 1835 was of brass, not silver. See Clark's "Reminiscences," page 7, where he corrects The Times correspondent's letter as to this particular statement.

Up to 1720 it is almost certain Handel had not visited Cannons; it is beyond controversy that he never was organist of Whitchurch at any period. The date on the plate was 1718; I wrote it so in my MS., and did not observe the printer's error.

Mr.Cutler's first "syllogism" I accept; not the second, and for the third I prefer the use of my own words: "Handel may have visited Whitchurch and probably performed on the organ; but it is certain that he never was organist of the church, nor did he compose on the organ therein."

The book from which I quoted, "A Journey through England in Familiar Letters, from a Gentleman Here to his Friend Abroad," is a very interesting volume, notwithstanding the erratical spelling of proper names, a fault not at all uncommon at the period at which the book was published (1724). The Duke of Chandos rebuilt Whitchurch on the model of his own private chapel, with variations, notably the "door that comes from the apartments above, and a staircase that also descends into the body of the chapel, in case of taking Sacrament or other occasion." He employed the same artists in the construction of both.

As an "enthusiastic Handelian" I yield to none, and as such I consider it a duty to endeavour to expose error and establish truth.-WILLIAM H. CUMMINGS.]

THE LATE JAMES TURLE'S HYMN-TUNES.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,-Will you kindly give me space in your columns to ask your readers whether they know of any other hymntunes by the late Mr. Turle, of Westminster Abbey, besides those published in the following books:-

"The Hymnary."

"Psalms and Hymns, with appropriate tunes," S.P.C.K. "The London Tune Book."

"The Children's Hymn Book."

"Westminster Abbey Special Service Book."
"The Year of Praise."

"Sarum Hymnal."

"Congregational Hymn and Tune Book."

"The Supplemental Hymn and Tune Book." Any information forwarded to Miss S. A. Turle, 177, Cromwell Road, S.W., will be gratefully received.
Yours faithfully,
S. A. TURLE.

VIOLINS AT THE INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,-I am anxious to offer a suggestion to the gentlemen who are charged with making the arrangements for the Department of Music in the approaching International Exhibition at South Kensington; and as your journal seems to me the best medium through which I can reach the Commissioners, I shall be obliged if you will kindly allow me a little space. Let me say that I am an enthusiastic amateur violinist. I assume that there will be a representative collection of violins, comprising some masterpieces of the great makers. Now, merely to look at the fine instruments, carefully secured in a glass case, will be a matter of interest; but if we could hear them played upon by a good performer, so that we might judge of the power, beauty, and variety of tone, the interest would be enhanced tenfold. Now, my suggestion is this that the permission of the owners of the violins should, if possible, be obtained, that a good player should be engaged, and that he should, at a stated hour, on two or three days in the week, perform solos on several violins, in order to illustrate the quality of the instruments. These performances would need to be given in a quiet room, for entrance to which a small admission fee might be charged if necessary.

I am sure such performances would be of great value and interest to hundreds-I may say thousands-of violinists, both professional and amateur, and I believe they would prove attractive to a good many who are not players. If the Commissioners can possibly see their way to carrying out my suggestion, I am sure they will do a good thing, and that many will heartily thank them.

Yours faithfully,

A LOVER OF THE VIOLIN.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

- Notices of concerts, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted. Our correspondents must specifically denote the date of each concert, for without such date no notice can be taken of the performance.
- Our correspondents will oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.
- Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications. We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.
- Notice is sent to all Subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is no second. We again remind those who are disappointed obtaining back numbers that, although the music is always kept in stock, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.
- H. G.—The real meaning of the word Andante is going; and as ino is a diminutive, Andantino must of course signify going less, or slower. In a musical sense, however, it is generally used to indicate that we are to move at a slow pace, and then Andantino, by diminishing the force of the word, directs us to proceed at a speed not so slow, or faster. Opinions still differ upon the subject, as may be seen by reference to any good Dictionary of Musical Terms.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

ABINDEDN.—On Tuesday, the roth ult., the Musical Association gave a performance of Mendelssohn's £High, to a crowded audience. With the exception of the part of Elijah, which was taken by Mr. R. Grice, the solos were allotted to members of the Society. Mr. E. Ivey, a young tenor of great promise, created a most favourable impression in 'If with all your hearts.'' The other solosits were Mrs. T. B. Kendall, Misses Anwyl, F. Clarke, Drewe, and M. E. Shepherd. A noticeable feature was the great improvement of the band, which, under the leadership of Mr. Wilsdon, was able to dispense with outside help. The pianoforte accompanists were Mrs. Slade Baker, Miss Coxeter, Miss M. Harding, and Miss M. E. Shepherd. Mr. Worley presided at the harmonium, and Mr. Fred. K. Couldrey conducted.

ACTON, SOUTH.—An Organ Recital was given by Mr. H. C. Ton-king, R.A.M., Organist of Westminster Chapel, on the 4th ult, at All Saints' Church. The programme included compositions by Stewart, Bennett, Best, Smart, Krebs, Batiste, and Silas.

ADELAIDE.—An Organ Recital was given in the Town Hall, on the evening of Monday, January 12, by Mr. T. H. Jones. The programme included Handel's Second Organ Concerto, Bach's St. Ann's Fugue, and an arrangement by Mr. W. T. Best of the Larghetto from Beethoven's Symphony in D. besides several other pieces of a lighter character. Mr. Jones's playing was much appreciated.

character. Mr. Jones's playing was much appreciated.

Albuquiseque, New Mexico, U.S.A.—The first Choral Service in the State of New Mexico was introduced a short time since, in St.
John's Episcopal Church, Albuquerque, under the direction of Mr. G.
Davis James, the Organist and Choirmaster of that church, formerly a resident of Plymouth, England, and pupil of Mr. Chas. E. Clemens, under whose direction, in Lent 1882, he successfully passed the local examination for organ playing of the Royal Academy of Music, London. The order of Service was as follows—Venite and Psalms
(Crotch), Te Deum and Jubilate, in F (Wesley), Litany and Responses
and Hymn "Ein feste Burg."

ALTON.—On the 17th litt, the Musical Society gave its first Concert at the Assembly Rooms, under the able conductorship of Mr. E. Osmond. The band and chorus numbered about seventy, and the leader of the orchestra was Mr. C. G. Halliday. Mr. C. Osmond presided at the harmonium, and Mr. A. Shepherd at the pianoforte. The artists engaged were Miss Manwell, Miss Jeanie Rosse, Mr. C. E. Pillow, and Mr. Seymour Kelly. The performance of Cowen's Ross Maides was excellent throughout, the choruses showing abundant proof of assiduous and well-directed training. Each performer in the miscellaneous selection of the second part was highly appreciated, and the complete success of the Concert must be highly gratifying to the members of the Society and their excellent Conductor.

AMPTHILL.—The Second Concert of the Musical Society was held in the Court Hall, on Friday, the 13th ult., when Schubert's Song of Miriam was well rendered by a band and chorus of some sixty of formers. The programme also included Mozart's Symphony in G. and Spohr's Quartet in G minor. Mr. H. W. Stewardson, L. Mus. T.C.L., ably conducted.

BEDFORD.—The last Monday Popular Concert of the third series BEDFORD.—The last Monday Popular Concert of the third Series colo place on the 2nd ult. in the Assembly Rooms. The programme, which was exceptionally good, was excellently rendered. The string quartet was represented by Messrs. Belrnett, Halipenny, Richardson, and Woolhouse. Mr. Diemer presided at the pianoforte with his usual skill, and in Bach's Concerto in C for two planos, with string quartet accompaniment, the second pianoforte was taken by his pupil, Mr. Frank Hollis. The vocalits was Mrs. Hutchinson, whose charming singing was greatly admired

BIRKENHEAD .- A successful Concert was given in the Queen's Hall on the 16th ult., for the purpose of raising funds to reduce the debt incurred by the restoration of Holy Trinity Church. The first part of the programme was devoted to Sir Sterndale Bennett's Pastoral The May Queen. Madame Billinie Porter, in the title rôle, fully sustained her high reputation, singing the whole of the music with brilliant success; Miss Frances Armstrong interpreted the part of the Queen with much dramatic force; Mr. Thomas Barlow was heard to great advantage in the music of the Lover, and Mr. Walter S. Christian displayed an excellent method as Robin Hood. The choir, numbering between forty and fifty ownlists, gave evidence of careful preparation, the bright fresh voices of the sopranos being well balanced as made orthestra, led by Mr. Arhur G. Laughton, rendered very efficient service. The second part was miscellaneous. Mr. Billinie Porter conducted.

BLOXWIH, WALSALL.—On Tuesday, January 27, the Philharmonic Society gave a very fine performance of Handel's Messiah in the Music Hall. The solos were sung by Mrs. Ford, Miss Dews, Mr. Ford, and Mr. Jones, all of whom acquitted themselves to the thorough satisfaction of the audience. The choir was well trained, and the rendering of "For unto us" and the Hallelujah Chorus left nothing to be desired. Mr. Rogers ably conducted, Mr. Somerfield ed the band, and Mr. W. Keay presided at the harmonium. There was a large attendance.

Bromscrove.—The local Philharmonic Society gave its second Subscription Concert on Tuesday evening, the 17th ult. The principals were Mrs. Glover Eaton, Miss Dews, Mr. Richard Clarke, and Mr. G. Harriss. The first part comprised a performance of the greater portion of Handel's Judas Maccabeus, the second part being miscellaneous, and including Eaton Faning's 'The Miller's Wooing,' The choir sang admirably throughout, and the principals did full justice to the beautiful, though somewhat trying music. Mr. Orton Beadly played Mendelsson's Rondo capriccioso, and two of Henselt's Studies, in a masterly manner, and Mr. Elgars gave a fine rendering of Vicustemps's Inlaide and Polonaine, and Kies's Romance. Mr. H. Eaton was the Conductor.

B. Hotott, Organization of the Philharmonic Society upon its present basis has led to the development of a new phase of musical culture in the city, a choir of female voices. This is not alored work, The Village Fair, was produced. Doubtless its success supplied work, The Village Fair, was produced. Doubtless its success supplied the germ from which sprang the present Society, with its abundant promise of a long and successful career. At the opening Concert of the season, Mendelssohn's Operetta, Son and Stranger, was given with much success. This was followed by Smart's Cautata for female voices, The Fishermatic mess, the sole vocalists being Mrs. Rogers, Miss Fetherstone, Miss Nicholson, and Miss Walton, all of whom were highly efficient. The Choir, too, was excellent throughout; the effect of the work being much aided by the clever orchestral accompaniment supplied by Dr. Longhurst. A feature in the programme was the artistic planoforte playing of Mr. Scholeheld, and mention must also be made of the "March of King Davids Army," from Dr. Longhurst's Oratorio, David and Absalom, which was finely rendered by band and choir, and warmly applauded. The Concert was brought to a close by a performance of C. H. Lloyd's Hero and Lecandry, which was sung throughout with much effect, the principal conditive being Miss Walton and Mr. Kempton. Dr. Longhurst conducted with his usual ability.

Cardiff Moscale in the National Schoolroom, on January 28, under the patronage of the Lord Bishop and Dean of the diocese. The programme included "Why do the roses" (Pearsalli, "Integer vites" (Fleminz), "Since first I saw" (Ford), "Softly fall" (Hatton), "The wreath," &c., which were given by the Society. The solo vocalists were Miss Emily Williams, Mr. Jenkins, and Master Sidney Barnett. Miss Bella Speir contributed a pianoforte solo, and Mr. R. Gould Thorne was the Conductor and Accompanist.—On Monday evening, the 16th ults, a very handsome timepiece was presented to Mr. Walter Scott by the members of the Cardiff Musical Association, bearing the following inscription: "Presented to Walter Scott, Esq., by the members of the Cardiff Musical Association, as a slight token of their appreciation of his services as Honorary Conductor of the Society, February 16, 1855."

CHELTENHAM.—The members of Mr. J. A. Mattheway's Choral and Orchestral Society gave the second Subscription Concert of the fifteenth season, in the Assemblated of the first and second parts of the first of the first and second parts of the first of th

Mr. Matthews conducted.

Chaistechuser, N.Z.—The season of 1884 was fittingly closed by the performance of The Messiahi in the Tuam Street Hall, on December 23. A very large audience assembled, numbering among it his excellency the Governor, Sir Wm. Jervois and suite. The soloists were the Misses Jones, Mason, and Rowley, Messra. Appleby, Boyd, Inzard, and Luisetti. Miss Jones was highly successful, singing excellently throughout, and giving much promise for the future. Mr. Boyd was very effective in the air "The people that walked," as was Signor Luisetti in "Why do the nations." The choruses were, however, the feature of the evening, being tea, unmbering twenty-six, was fairly efficient; but the Overture and Pastoral Symphony would have profited by more rehearsal. Mr. Wells conducted with his usual ability.

CIRENCESTER.—Mr. Ralph Norris gave his first annual Concert, at the Corn Hall, on the 12th ult., assisted by Miss Patti Winter, Miss Coyte Turner, Mr. John Probert, and Mr. James Bayne, all of whom were very successful.

COLCHESTER.—Mr. A. W. Dace gave his first Concert at the new Corn Exchange, on the 13th ult. The principal vocalists were Miss Kate Winifred Payne, Miss Annie Buckland, Mr. Arthur Thompson, and Mr. Musgrove Tufnail, the last named artist securing an encore for his excellent rendering of the Toreador Song from Cammen. A Concert of so high a character is very rare in the town, and the reception of all the pieces was such as to encourage the adoption of purely classical music on future occasions.

Covenies.—The members of the St. John's Choral Class gave a Concert in the new schools, Dover Street, on Thursday evening, the right ult, the chief feature in the programme being Cowen's Rose Maiden. There was a large audience, and, considering that this was the first effort of the class since its formation, the Cantata was very creditably rendered, great praise being due to Mr. Robertson for the admirable manner in which he had trained the Choir. The soloists were Miss Deacon, Mrs. Cramp, and Messrs, Clarke and Ward. Mr. Denham played the accompaniments upon the piano, and Mrs. Hughes rendered efficient assistance with the American organ. The second part was misscellaneous.

CREWKERNE.—On Thursday evening, the 12th ult., a Concert was given in the National School Room, before a large and fashionable audience. Miss Marie Bane (who was particularly successful, each of her songs receiving an encore, Madame Adolphi, and Mr. T. Lomas were the vocalists. Instrumental selections were performed by the band of the G Company 2nd Vol. Bat. Som. L. L., and a choir under the able conductorship of Mr. Geo. Gurney rendered several part-songs.

DARLINGTON.—The annual Festival of St. John's Glee Society, was held on Tuesday, the 18th ult, in St. John's Church. The Festival commenced with a brief Service, including a short address from the Vicar (the Rev. J. G. Richardson, M.A.), after which selections from the works of Mozart, Mendelssohn, Handel, Haydn, and Beethoven were rendered with good effect by the members of the Society, under the conductorship of Mr. W. Ingram. The tenor solos were sung by Mr. G. H. Welch, of Durham Cathedral; and the bass solos by Mr. T. Tate, of Darlington. Mr. Charles Stephenson, Organist of the church, ably accompanied.

DERBY.—At the conclusion of the usual practice by the members of the Choral Union, at the Guild Hall, on January 25, a presentation was made to Mr. William Crowther (hon. Secretary of the Union) of a cottage pianoforte, by Collard and Collard; and to Mrs. Crowther of a handsome gold watch, both gifts being suitably inscribed with an acknowledgment of the valuable services rendered by Mr. Crowther during the past six years.

DOVER.—A very successful performance of Rossini's Stabat Mater and Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise was given by the members of the Harmonic Society, on the 10th ult, in the New Town Hall. The vocalists were Madame Minnie Gwynne, Mrs. Hugh Massey, Mr. Alfred Kenningham, and Mr. R. Rhodes. The performance was conducted by Mr. J. W. Howells.

HALSTEAD.—Mr. George Leake's annual Concert took place at the Town Hall, on the 9th ult., the principal artists being Miss Agnes Liddell (of the Guidhall School of Music) and Mr. D. Harrison, vocalists; Herr Stromeyer (violin), Mr. J. Burnett (violoncello), Mr. W. L. Barrett (flute), and Mr. C. J. Wood, Royal College of Music (pianoforte). A feature in the programme was Beethoven's Trio in C minor; and the violin, flute, and violoncello pieces elicited warm applause. The vocalists were highly successful in all their solos. Mr. Leake was an able accompaniet.

HAVESRILL—A performance of Barnett's Ancient Mariner was given by the Choral Union, on the :8th ult. The artists were Miss Kate Fusselle, Miss Susenta Fenn, Mr. E. J. Bitton, Mr. Holberry Hagyard, and Mr. Bantock Pierpoint (vocalists), Mr. G. Hotton (choe), Mr. Anderson (bassoon), Mrs. D. Gurteen (pianoforte), Mr. T. Jarvis (organ). Mr. D. Gurteen, jun, was the Conductor. The band was miscellaneous.

HAWICK.—An excellent performance of Haydn's Creation was given by the members of the Harmonic Society, on Wednesday evening, January 26, in the Exchange Hall. The solo vocalists were Mrs. Hutchinson, Mr. Holberry Hagyard, and Mr. Bantock Pierpoint. The instrumentalists, numbering forty-few, were from Mr. Mannis's orchestra. Mr. W. Fiddes Wilson, Organist of St. John's Church, conducted with marked ability.

HUDDERSFIELD.—A Concert was given at the Town Hall, on the 20th ult., by Miss Frances Simpson, assisted by Miss Kate Simpson, Mr. Fred. Mace, and Mr. W. Bartin. Miss Simpson's selections from Chopia, Scharwenka, Mayer, and other composers were excellently rendered, and Mr. Mace was very successful in his songs.

HURSTPIERPOINT.—The fourth of a series of Organ Recitals was given in the Parish Church by the Organist, Mr. H. C. Young, B.A., Cantab, on the ythult. The programme included Handel's Overture to Samson, and selections from the works of Smart, Mendelssohn, Vincent Novello, and Batiste. Smart's "Andante quasi Pastorale" was especially admired.

KENDAL.—Mr. S. Claude Ridley (of Liverpool) gave his fourth Organ Recital, on the 19th ult., in the Unitarian Chapel. The programme, which was varied and well-selected, was rendered with much success, a Military March (by Mr. Ridley) being encored.

KILMARNOK.—The Philharmonic Society celebrated the bi-centenary of Handel's birth on the 20th ult, by a performance of The Messiah. The vocalists were Madame Samuell, Miss Helen D'Alton, Mr. Chilley, and Mr. Hilton. The choruses were well rendered. The orchestra was led by Mr. W. Cole. Mr. Joseph Wilson was Organist, and Mr. Newsome Conductor.

KNARSSRO'.—Miss Fannie Sellers gave her annual Concert in the Town Hall, on Monday, the 2nd ult. The beinficiairs was very successful in her selections, which included "La Serenata" (Brega) and a new song, "To-day, my love," composed expressly for her by Mr. A. W. Gilling. Miss Sellers was assisted by Miss Eliza Thomas, R.A.M., Mr. A. Farrer Briggs, and Mr. Dan Billington; Miss Florence Sidney (solo violin), and Mr. A. W. Gilling (solo pianoforte) all of whom gave great satisfaction to a large and enthusiastic audience.

LEEK.—Mr. P. A. Rayner gave his third annual Ballad Concert, in the Temperance Hall, on the 2nd ult. The vocalists were Miss Madge Morgan, Mr. Seymour Jackson, and Mr. Feed, Gordon. Violin solos were contributed by Mons. Samuel Speelman and para golos by Priscilla Frost. A miscellaneous programme was well rendered.

LEICESTER.—Mr. Harvey Löhr's Second Chamber Concert, of the third season, was given in the Museum Lecture Hall, on Thursday evening, January 29, when an excellent programme was admirably rendered. Mr. Löhr was assisted by Mr. Lazarus, clarinet; and Mr. Charles Fletcher, violin. The vocalist engaged was Miss Marian McKenzie, but, owing to family bereavement; she was unable to appear, and her place was filled by Mr. Arthur Oswald.

Lincola,—The members of the Harmonic Society gave the first Concert of the second season in the Corn Exchange, on Tuesday January 27, Mendelssohn's St. Paul being the work selected for performance. The solo vocalists were Miss Ambler, Miss Thomas, Mr. F. Barrington Foote, and Mr. Dunkerton. Mr. C. W. Page presided at the harmonium, and Mr. F. Marshall Ward conducted. The Oratorio was admirably rendered.

Oratorio was admirably rendered.

Louenboxouch—On Tuesday, January 27, a Concert was given in the Holy Trinity Schoolroom, in presence of a large audience, on behalf of the local branch of the Giris' Friendly Society, the members of which supplied the soprani and contralt to the choir. There was a full band and chorus, numbering about 100 performers. The Pastoral Symphony, from The Messiah, was first rendered by the band, and Cowen's "Children's Home." followed, sung by Miss Garrett. The Service of Song, "Fastad's First Prayer, was then performed, Miss Jackson singing the soprano solos with much expression and musical feeling. One of the tunes published in the book (that to the words "We all might do good") being deemed unsuitable, a new tune was written (by request) specially for the occasion by Mr. Alfred Paget, a local amateur, and met with a favourable reception. The Performance of the Service reflected great credit on Miss Gibson (A.S.A., Mem. T.C.L.), who trained the girls of the Society, and also on Mr. W. James (Organist of Holy Trinity Church), who ably conducted. Upwards of £13 was realised by the Concert.

ducted. Upwards of £13 was realised by the Concert. LUTON.—The second Subscription Concert of the 18th season of the Choral Society was given in the Town Hall on the 2nd ult, when Haydn's Creation was performed, followed by a miscellaneous selection. The band was efficiently led by Mr. Haydn Inwards, of the R.C.M., son of the conductor, supported by eminent players from the principal London orchestras. The soloists were Miss M. Fenna, Mr. John Probert and Mr. Musgrove Tufnail. Miss Fenna, who made had but here on the occasion, was highly successful, especially in the Air "On mighty pens." Mr. John Probert (who likewise made his first appearance in Luton) and Mr. Tufnail also created a most favourable impression, and elicited warm applause. The choruses were effectively rendered, reflecting much credit on the careful training of Mr. Charles Inwards, who conducted with his well known ability.

Lynn,—A performance of Dr. Horace Hill's Oratorio Nehemials was recently given by the Philharmonic Society with much success. The principal vocalists were Miss Agnes Larkcom, Miss Susetta Fenn, Mr. Holberry Hagyard, and Mr. Musgrove Tufnail; and the choir consisted almost entirely of members of the Society. The work was received with warm appliause by a large and appreciative audience; and at the loss of the Oratorio, Dr. Hill received quite an ovation.

MACCLESFIELD.—The Philharmonic Society gave a performance of Handel's Judas Maccabaus in the large Sunday School, on Tuesday, the 17th ult. The principal vocalists were Miss F. Bristowe, Miss Dutton, Mr. Seymour Jackson, and Mr. John Barrow. The Concert was both musically and financially a decided success. The proceeds are to be handed over to the infirmary. The Society now comprises a chorus and band of 150 members, and all concerned are to be congratulated upon their last performance. Mr. Hawkins conducted.—Mr. Samuel Moss gave his second ballad Concert of the season on Monday, January 26, in the Sunday School, assisted by Miss A. Moore, Mr. Seymour Jackson, and Mr. Maltby. Mr. Grundy contributed several organ solos, which were thoroughly appreciated; and also presided at the pianoforte.

MALVERN LINK—On Monday, the 16th ult., a Concert was given by the choristers of St. Matthias's, when a varied programme was very creditably performed. The members of the choir sang several partsongs, and impressed the audience with their careful training. Messrs. F. and H. Harris, Selton, Venner, and Lucas deserve great praise for the efficient manner in which they sang the music allotted to them. Mr. W. H. Main acted as Conductor, and was assisted by his pupil, Mr. F. Hobro, who received an error for haviolin bod for the performance on the same instrument. The Concert was given for the benefit of the choir, and the receipts were very satisfactory.

MARKET DRAYTON.—Mendelssohn's Elijah formed the programme of the second Concert of the season, in connection with the Market Drayton Musical Society, given in the Assembly Room, on the 12th Ut. The band (principally from Birmingham) and chorus consisted of about 100, and the Society, as well as Mr. Fred. Evans (its conductor), are to be congratulated on the result of so successful a performance. Miss Eleanor Falkner and Miss Frances Carew were thoroughly satisfactory in the soprano and contraito music respectively. Mr. Fredericks (of Lichheld Cathedral) undertook the tenor solos at short notice, through the indisposition of Mr. Kemp, andsang with much refinement. As the Prophet, Mr. E. Robinson (of Chester Cathedral) was highly effective, especially in "Is not His word like a fire," and "It is enough."

MELBOURES.—An entertainment, for gentlemen only, was given by hre," and "It is enough."

MELBOURE.—An entertainment, for gentlemen only, was given by the Metropolitan Liedertafel, at the Athenaeum, on December 22, which was very fully attended. The part-singing was excellent throughout, a feature in the programme being the Festgesang, by Mendelssohn, which was heard on this occasion for the first time in Melbourne.
A comical musical scene, "Italian Salad," the composition of Richard Genée, was highly successful, and mention must also be made of a "Kinder Symphonie," by J. Lachner, which was well played and cordially received. The solo vocalists, Signor Coy, Mr. Moyle, Mr. T. A. Groube, and Mr. A. J. Pallett, were thoroughly satisfactory; and two violin solos, excellently played by Mr. Henry Curtis, were welcome contributions to the programme. Mr. Herz conducted, as usual, and Messrs. Guenett and Peake shared the work of accompaniment.

Messrs. Guenett and Peare snared the work of accompaniment.

Modd.—During the past winter a new Choral Society has been established here, and judging from its first Concert, given in the Town Hall, on Monday the 3rd ult., before a crowded audience, it has every prospect of success. The programme was divided into sacred and secular portions, and the artists engaged were Madame Douglas, Miss Helena Edwards, Mr. Milward, Mr. Myaut, and Mr. Robinson, of the Chester Cathedral choir; with Mr. J. P. Adams secondpanies, and Mr. Thomas Foulkes, Conductor. The programment which was carefully selected, was exceedingly well rendered throughout.

NEATH—The Harmonic Society gave its annual Concert at the Assembly Rooms on Thursday, the rath uit. The work selected was Handel's Oratorio Sault. The vocalists were Mrs. Mason, Miss Crighton, Miss Katherine James, Mr. Hopkin Morgan, and Mr. David Hughes. Mrs. Mason was heard to much advantage in the sopranoslos, and Miss James sang the contralto part with great take and care," Your words, O King," and "Impious wretch," being especially effective. Mr. Morgan and Mr. Hughes also gave great satisfaction in their respective parts. The choir was efficient. The band was led by Mr. W. F. Hulley, and Mr. J. LI. Matthews was the Conductor.

NEWTOWNARDS, BELFAST.—The first of a series of Organ Recitals was given by Mr. Herbert Westerby (London University) on the 3rd ult, upon the new organ erected by Messrs. P. Conacher and Co., in the Parish Church. The prorp reference of the Control of the Control of the Parish Church. The prorp sells "(S. S. Wesley); FourthOrgan Concerto (Handel); Andante, with Variations, from Notturno, Op. 34 (Spohly); Offertoic, No. 4, in G (Welly); Andante and Allegretto, from Violin Sonata in A (Handel); War March, Athalie (Mendelsohn); Fugue in G mino, Book II, (J. S. Bach).

New York.—On the first Sunday in the past month, Mr. Le Jeune organised a service of exceptional excellence at St. John's Chapel. The choir evidenced signs of the most careful training, the Magnificat (Hopkins), the Nunc dimittis in A flat (Mendelssohn), and some most effective settings of other portions of the service, by Mr. Le Jeune, being admirably rendered. During the offertory the first part of Molique's Oratorio, Abraham, was sung, and the processional was the Organist's "Jerusalem the Golden." There was a large and most attentive congregation.

NOTTINGHAM.—Mr. Bingley Shaw and Mr. Edwin Longmore, Lay Clerks of Southwell, gave a most successful Concert, in the Albert Hall, on Tuesday, the 10th ult, under the patronage of His Worship the Mayor (Alderman Eurton) and other influential gentlemen. The principal vocalists were Madame Clara Gardiner, Miss Ada Porter, and Mr. T. H. Selby; instrumentalists, the Misses Porter: Conductor and accompanist, Mr. W. T. Cockrem.

and accompanist, Mr. W. T. Cockrem.

OTTAWA.—The Philharmonic Society's Concert, which took place at the Opera House, on January 21, was in every respect a decided success. The first part was devoted to a performance of Sterndale Bennett's Cantata The May Queen, the principal vocalists in which—were thoroughly efficient, the choruses also being sung with much precision and effect. In the second part, which was miscellaneous, an excellent part-song, "Siumber on, baby dear," by Oliver King, was a prominent feature; Mr. Boucher's violin solo, and an instrumental trio, by Mrs. Harrison, Messra. Reiching and Brewer, being also especially the May of the Concert was excellently conducted by Mr. Harrison features.

PORTSMOUTH.—The Borough of Portsmouth Philharmonic Society gave a performance of Prout's Alfred at the Portland Hall, on the 3rd ult. The vocalists were Miss Bertha Moore, Mr. John Probert, and Mr. Bayne. Mr. Pillow conducted.

RETFORD.—A very successful Concert of vocal and instrumental music was given in the Town Hall, on Thursday, January 29, by Mr. Hamilton White, assisted by members of his vocal class. To 29, principal feature of the evening was the part-singing, the various items being interpreted with unfailing accuracy and judgment.

Rushnen.—The teath annual Concert of Mr. J. E. Smith, Organist of the Parish Church, took place in the New Hall, on the 4th ult. before a large audience. Amongst the instrumental items may be mentioned Gounod's March to Calvary," from The Redemyltion, and a Capriccio by Mendelssohn, both of which were excellently played by Master Aifred Clarke and the concert-giver, as pianoforte duets. The principal vocalists were Madame Lita Jarratt, R.A.M., Miss E. Bailey, and Mr. D. Harrison, all of whom were warmly received, Madame 'Il Bacio.'' Mdlle. Adelina Dinelli (violin), and Mr. Giuseppe Dinelli (violoncello) also contributed solos, and joined Mr. J. E. Smith in a pianoforte trio by Haydn. The Concert was in every respect highly successful.

St. Asapi.—The members of the Choral Society gave a Concert in the National Schools, on Monday, the 2nd ult, the programme consisting of Gaul's Canata, The Holy City, and a miscellaneous selection. The solo parts were well rendered by members of the Society, assisted by Madame Lita Jarratt, whose singing was much admired. The accompaniments were admirably played by the Rev. W. Morton, Succentor, and Mr. Ll. Lloyd, Assistant Organist of the Cathedral. Mr. Felix C. Watkins conducted.

Mr. Felix C. Watkins conducted.

Sherbornes.—M. Alexandre Guilmant gave a Recital on the organ lately erected in the great schoolroom, Sherborne School, on the 9th ult., before a large and enthissatic audience. The programme was varied and highly interesting.—The eighty-third Concert of the School Musical Society took place on Thursday, the 19th ult., when the programme was selected entirely from the works of Handel. There was a complete Handelian orchestra, exclusively formed by members and honorary members of the society. The singing of the choir was jvery good, and Taylor and Carver greatly distinguished themselves in their duet. Taylor also sang "Lascia ch'io pianga" very finely. The Concert was altogether a great success, and formed a fitting celebration of the bi-centenary of Handel's birth. The Conductor was Mr. Louis N. Parker.

SOUTHERA.—The annual Concert in aid of the Post Office Orphan Home, was given at the Portland Hall, on the 9th ult, before a large audience. The soprano vocalist, Miss Eleanor Falkner, was highly successful, eliciting an encore in Balfe's ballad "I dreamt that I dwelt"; and praise must also be awarded to Miss Emilie Lloyd, R.A.M. (who has a good and well trained contrail to voice), Messrs. H. Piercy and Arthur Oswald. The accompaniments were efficiently performed by Mr. G. S. Löhr on the pianoforte.

SOUTHWELL.—Mr. E. Longmore and Mr. Bingley Shaw gave a vocal and instrumental Concert, on the 11th ult, in the Concert Hall, King Street. They were assisted by Miss Ada Porter (vocalist), and the instrumentalists were Miss Nellie Porter (piccolo), Miss Amy Porter (violocello), Miss Gertie Porter (violic), and Miss Ada Porter (pianoforte). The hall was filled with an appreciative audience.

STAFFORD.—Special Choral Services were held in Hatherton Church on January 29, on the occasion of the opening of a new organ built by Messrs. Nicholson and Lord, of Walsali. Dr. Taylor, Organist of St. Mary's, ably presided at the instrument, and displayed its capabilities in an admirable manner.

STANSTED MOUNTFITCHET.—The Concert given by the Church Choral Society, on the 4th ult., was a decided success. One special feature of the evening's entertainment was the exquisite performance of Mr. W. E. Whitehouse (associate and professor R.A.M.) on the violoncello, the singing of Miss Farren, Miss Alyward, Mr. Hagyard, and Mr. Harvey Day being also admirable, and eliciting the most enthusiastic applause. Mr. Hodges must be heartily congratulated upon the performance of the Society, with whose training he has evidently taken the greatest pains; the part-songs were tastefully executed, the "Rhine Maiden" in particular being exceedingly well rendered.

STRATORD.—On the rath ult, the Upton Choral Society gave its periodical Concert at the Town Hall, before a large audience. The programme comprised two Moletta, some sones and part-sones, as cells soles, which were much applianted. The principal vocalists were Miss Ellen Atkins, Messrs, Arthur Thompson, and J. A. Brousil. Messrs, F. C. Kitson and G. B. Gilbert, at the piano and harmonium respectively, opened the Concert with the Overture to Athaliz, which were extremely well. The verse Anthem seemed somewhat heavy, but the motett, "By Babylon's Wave" (Gounod), amply compensated the audience for any disassisfaction that may have been felt in the preceding piece. Mr. J. A. Brousil (violoncello), in his various performances, gave evidence of a thorough command of his instrument, and was deservedly encored; Miss Atkins, Mr. A. Thompson, the Misses F. and G. M. Jones, and Mr. A. W. Butlin contributing vocal pieces with much success. The choruses and part-songs were remarkably well sung, especially the "Song of the Vikings," which brought the Concert to a close. Mr. Joseph Proudman conducted.

SUNNURY-ON-TRAMES,—The Choral Society gave a fine perform-

SUNBURY-ON-THAMES.—The Choral Society gave a fine performance of Birch's Cantata, The Mervic Men of Sherwood Forest, at the Institute, on the 5th ult. to a crowded audience. The principal vocalists were Miss Emily Palmer, Mr. Albon Nash, and Mr. Edwyn Bishop, all of whom received well-merited applause. The choruses were admirably rendered. In the second part, which was miscellaneous, songs were contributed by the above-named artists, and also by Miss Gaurd, Mrs. Croydale, Mr. Albon Nash, and Mr. Edwyn Bishop. Herr A. Hoering presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. David Knott conducted.

SWINDON.—Mozart's First Mass formed the first part of a successful Concert given at the Corn Exchange, on the 12th Ust, bythe Harmonic Society. The soprano solo, "Agnus Dei," was creditably sunp by Miss A. Townsend. The accompaniements were ably supplied by Mr. F. G. Wright, hon. accompanies to the Society; and Mr. G. White-head conducted. The second part was miscellaneous, a selection of songs being given by Mrs. Harrison Smith, Miss A. Townsend, Miss Grymes, Messra, A. Jenkins, and W. M. Ellesor (members of the society); Mr. Wright contributing a pianoforte solo.

(members of the society); Mr. Wright contributing a pianoforte solo. Swinyon.—The members of the Annateur Glee Class gave their second Concert, on January 28, in the National School, before a large audience, the programme comprising Glees and Partessongs, by Birch, Bishop, Caldicott, Webbe, Jackson, Patterson, Hatton, Leslie, and others. The rendering of these pieces elicited muth applause, especially Caldicott's "Jack and Jill" and "Humpty Dumpty" which had to be repeated. The class had the assistance in the vocal department of Master Webbe, Messrs. Yates and Marshall; solo pianoforte, Miss R. N. Levett; solo violin, Master Dickie, all of whom were highly successful. Mr. G. A. Nixon, Organist of the Pariah Church, conducted.

TROWBEIDGE.—The Musical Union, under the conductorship of Mr. H. Millington, gave a Concert at St. James's Hall, on the 9th ult. The programme comprised Gounod's Gallia, Mendelssohn's Hear my Prayer, and a miscellaneous selection of vocal and orchestral music. The vocalist was Madame Lita Jarratt, and the band and chorus numbered about eighty.

WARE.—The usual monthly Organ Recital was given in the Parish Church, on Thursday, the 12th ult., the performers being Mr. F. J. Karn, Mus. Bac., Cantab, and Mr. J. L. Gregory, F.C.O. A well selected classical programme was admirably rendered.

WARINSTER.—A vocal and instrumental Concert was given at the Athensum, on the roth ult. The programme was a miscellaneous one, the actists being Madame Lita Jarratt, Miss Emilie Lloyd, and Mr. W. Thomas (vocalists); Mr. W. Millington (volon), Mr. J. V. Pomeroy (violoncello), and Mr. H. Millington was the Conductor.

Wellington.—At the opening of the new Town Hall, on the 13th ult., an excellent Concert was given by the Harmonic Society. The vocalists were Miss Beare, Miss Dudeney, Mr. T. Taylor, and Mr.

A. L. Francis. The programme was divided into two parts, the first being miscellaneous, and the second consisting of Handel's Cantata Alexander's Feast. The solos, by the singers named above, were excellently rendered, and in every respect the Concert was highly successful. A feature in the evening was the artistic harmonium accompaniment of Mr. J. R. Toms.

Accompaniment of Mr. J. R. Founs.

Wellingforn, N.Z.—The sixth season of the Harmonic Club was opened on December 18 with an excellent performance of Schubert's Song of Mirkman and Barnett's Ancient Mariner, under the direction of Mr. Robert Parker, both works being given with orchestral accompaniment. The soprano solos were admirably sung by Mrs. George Cotterell, and the part of the Ancient Mariner was effectively rendered by a local amateur. In the prospectus for the season, the following works are announced: Lloyd's Hero and Leander, Barnby's Rebekah, and Gade's Chrusaders.

wiresworth—On Thursday, the 19th ult, Mr. N. M. Day, Organist of the Parish Church, gave one of his popular Concerts in the Town Hall. The artists were Madame Carina Clelland, Miss A. E. Mekin, Mr. Everard Scott, and Mr. S. J. Bishop; solo violin, Miss M. A. Dawes; solo pianoforte, Miss F. Stone, and Mr. N. M. Day, Madame Clelland delighted the audience by her refined style and charming voice. Miss Mekin possesses a good voice, and sang with a confidence and expression not often met with in young amateurs. Mr. Bishop made his first appearance in Wirksworth, and revealed a voice of great compass and power. Mr. Scott, who has been heard here several times, met with a hearty reception. Mr. Day acted as accompanist with his usual skill.

WITHAM.—A Concert in behalf of a local charity was given in the Institute, on Tuesday evening, the ryth ult., by Mr. N. Howlett, Organist. The hall was filled by an appreciative audience. Miss Kate Chaplin was the only professional artist engaged, and her violin solos were beautifully rendered and thoroughly enjoyed. The other items of the programme were contributed by performers from the neighbour-aimment of the programme were contributed by performers from the neighbour-aimment of the programme were contributed by performers from the neighbour-aimment of the programme were contributed by performers from the neighbour-aimment of the programment of th pianoforte selections most artistically.

Wolverhampton.—The third Concert of the Festival Choral Society, on January 26, at the Agricultural Hall, was in every respect highly successful. The first part, entirely devoted to a selection from the works of Handel, opened with the "Occasional Overture," and included the choruses, "When His loud voice" (Jephtha), "May no rash intruder" (Solomon), and the "Hailstone" Chorus (Israel in Egyph), all of which were given with much precision and effect. Mr. Piercy, who replaced Mr. Maas, absent through indisposition, created a marked impression in his two solos, especially "The enemy said," which was delivered with appropriate fire and vigour; and much praise must be given to Mdle, Elly Warnots, her rendering of "Sweet bird" (with Mr. Langton's flute obbligato) exiting the most enthusiastic applause. The Organ Concerto (No. 1, in G minor) was marred by the cyphering of the instrument, Mr. Roper, however, manfully battling against this serious drawback, and evidencing much artistic skill and feeling throughout his performance. The second part of the Concert was miscellaneous. Dr. Swinnerton Heap conducted with his usual care and judgment.

WORESTER.—Mr. Spark brought his season to a close with a very successful Concert on the 6th ult. The artists were Mülle. Marimon (in place of Madame Carlotta Pattl, absent from indisposition), Miss Jennie Dickerson, Mr. Henry Guy, and Mr. Barrington Foote (vocaists); Signor Papini (violinist), Mons. de Munck (cellist), and Signor Tito Mattei (pianist). There was a very large adulence, and the excellent rendering of the programme was thoroughly appreciated.

WORKSOP—On Monday evening, the 2nd ult, Farmer's Christ and His Soldiers was performed in the Criterion Hall by a band and chorus of seventy performers. The Concert formed part of the Choir Anniversary of the Methodist Free Church, the choir of which was assisted by others in the town, and by Messrs. Marsden and Dodworth (violiss), G. H. Stokes (viola), and Barlow (obee) (of Sheffield), and cher local players. The solos were sung by Mr. Mawer, Mr. Mosley, and members of the choir. Mr. A. E. Hill, Organist and Choirmaster of the Free Church, conducted; and Mr. H. Hodges, of St. John's, presided at the harmonium. The performance was highly successful.

ORGAN APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. W. H. Martin, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Mark's, Marylebome Road.—Mr. Hamilton Robinson, F.C.O., Organist and Choirmaster to St. Stephen's Church, South Kensington.—Mr. Arthur J. Lambert, Organist and Choirmaster to Christ Church, Louto.—Mr. Thos. Pollard, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Hubert's Catholic Church, Great Harwood, near Blackburn, Lancashire.—Mr. M. W. superiority of his Patent over those I have already seen and used is most obvious.

"GEORGE THOMPSON, M.A."

"Dear Sir,—I have deferred writing to comment upon your Pedals and Action now attached to my pianofore until I could satisfy myester of their utility and efficiency. I can now conscientiously say that they more than fulfi all my anticipations. Although I am no carpetter, aided by your lucid diagram I had little difficulty in attaching them myself, and it is impossible to over-estimate the confort they give to me or to conceive the saving of time one experiences in one's own room.—Believe me, yours truly, me or to conceive the baying room.—Believe me, yours truly, "BURNHAM HORNER, F.R.Hist.S."

PIANOFORTES

The Pedals and Patent Action supplied by the above well-known Inventor are giving a great impetus to the present generation of Organists and Students in the art of Pedalling, and, as it is well known that most, if not all, of our great Organ Players had the advantage o a Pianoforte with Pedals attached by the old and cumbersome roller board system, it should be known that by this new invention the Pedals can be purchased and attached at a small cost with a Mahogany Action which is perfectly noiseless, and without any springs or intri cate parts to get out of repair. Organ music can thus be enjoyed and practised without the usual trouble and expense of an organ-blower This invention is quite different to any other Patent Action, and being the most recent, it is as great an improvement over others as the Steam Engine is over the old Stage Coach.

Send to the Inventor, as below, for the Drawings and Prices to the Profession and Trade.

DR. F. E. GLADSTONE says :-

"I have much pleasure in stating my opinion that Mr. WILLIAM CHINNOCK DYER'S Patent Action for attaching Organ Pedals to Pianoforte is likely to prove very valuable to Organists and Studentof the Organ.

"It possesses several advantages over other actions which hav come under my observation, and I shall have no hesitation in recom mending the invention to my friends and pupils."

All is sent complete, with full printed "Directions for Attaching and the Action, being placed under the keyboard of the instrument, easily attached to any Pianoforte.

WORDS AND MUSIC BY WELL-KNOWN AUTHORS AND COMPOSERS.

Price Sixpence. The Words only, price One Penny.

The Singing of Easter Carols, much more than of Carols for Christmas and Epiphany, has of late years fallen into disuse. It is certain, however, that by omitting to employ the cheering help of the "Spiritual Song," congregations in the Metropolis and in large towns are exposed to the captivating allurements of that "Service of Song," so universally adopted by "American Revivalista," "Salvationists," and others, to win the affections and enlist the sympathies of the "masses." Whereas in churches where the custom of singing Carols at the great festivals has been revived, the gain has been apparent, not only in the increased attendance, devotion, and delight of the congregation, but in the fact that the people have carried off those songs to sing them in their homes at the piano on Sundays, and out into the world in their memories to hallow and cheer their daily toil.

"The very excellent illustrations scattered throughout the book materially increase its value; and we sincerely hope that Dr. Stainer's labours may be rewarded as they deserve, for not only has he accumulated a large mass of reliable information upon a subject of the deepest interest, but he has thrown additional light upon much of this evidence by giving us the result of his own practical experience."—Musical

MUSICAL STANDARD.

"On the evening of Good Friday, the congregation of St. Augustine's Church were invited to attend the first performance of their organist's new sacred work—a musical illustration of subjects connected with the 'Passion' of the Saviour. In this fresh musical product Mr. Gaul has the advantage of an open field, till very recently closed almost entirely to the Anglican Church composer; so that at the outset his work claims the merit of distinctiveness. The text of Mr. Gaul's work, varied and elaborate in structure, is the compilation of the Rev. J. C. Blissard, author at the same time of the original lyrical portions of the work. The course of sacred events connected with the Passion is laid out by the writer so as to form a series of six distinct's seenes, 'the literary construction of these being similar in plan throughout, but each preserving its own separate these divisions, each occupied with a particular stage of the Mystary, are respectively: 'The traitor at the table,' 'The Denial.' The Condemnation before Pliate,' 'The Mockery on Calvary'. 'The Shadow of Death,' and 'The Holy Sepulchre.' Each comprises a prophetic portion (the words selected from those passages of Holy Writ' foreshadowing' the event), and preceded by a short choral, which is retained unaltered throughout the work; a narrative portion dealing with the especial event, and what may be termed the lyrical peode, a hymn embodying the subjective reflection on the preceding passages, and in which the whole congregation is supposed to take protection of the compaction of the work. As regards the composer's endeavouring to illustrate in the best manner possible the outward course of the events, the dramatic element, properly so called, has been carefully kept out of the work. Individual characterisation has been carefully kept out of the work. Individual characterisation has been carefully kept out of the work. Individual characterisation has been carefully kept out of the work. Individual characterisation has been the proper of the venture of the

BIRMINGHAM DAILY MAIL.

"A second experience simply confirms the remark hazarded on the first presentation—viz., that the work is not only the most important Mr. Gaul has yet given to the world of art, but is one that, when familiar, must arrest attention."

THE ORGAN WORKS

JOHN SEBASTIAN BACH

EDITED BY

J. F. BRIDGE, AND JAMES HIGGS, Mus. Doc., Oxon. Mus. Bac., Oxon.

BOOK I.-EIGHT SHORT PRELUDES AND FUGUES 28.6d. on I.—EIGHT SHORT PRELUDES AND FUGUES.

BOOK II .- PRELUDES, FUGUES, AND TRIO

The second book of the new edition of Bach's Organ Works is more advanced in point of difficulty than the first, and will be found of conspicuous interest. It includes the well-known "Giant" in D minor, the shorter Prelude and Fugue in E minor (a great favourite with Mendelssohn), and an exceedingly effective Prelude and Fugue in C minor, in addition to other less-known but important works. It is a specialty of this edition that a convenient and effective mode of performance is everywhere indicated. Appended to the preface is a suggested metronomic rate for each movement.

BOOK III .- PRELUDES, FUGUES, AND FANTASIAS ... 3s. od III.—PRELUDES, FUGUES, AND FANTASIAS...
The third book contains compositions of greater difficulty, it is therefore more fully ingered and marked for the pedals. It is believed Organ Students will derive the greatest possible assistance by having their attention directed from the outset to a convenient method of dealing with each difficulty as it arises. The present book includes the Fugue in B minor, on a subject from Corelli, a beautiful Prelude and Fugue in A major (most useful for obtaining command of the higher part of the

A DRAMATIC ORATORIO

JOSEPH BENNETT

AND THE MUSIC COMPOSED EXPRESSLY FOR THE NORWICH MUSICAL FESTIVAL, 1884, BY A. C. MACKENZIE.

Paper cover, 5s.; Paper boards, 6s.; Scarlet cloth, 7s. 6d. Tonic Sol-fa Edition, 2s.

THE TIMES.

"The reception of the work here was decidedly favourable, and at the end the composer received a perfect ovation, in which the chorus and the audience took part with equal cordiality."

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

"At the close the general verdict was unmistakable; 'cheer after cheer rang through the hall, while the members of the choir rained down flowers upon the fortunate composer. The Norwich audience thus stamped the oratorio with their approval. They could do no other and be just."

STANDARD.

"I have already alluded to the hearty reception given to Mr. Mackenzie, who richly deserved all the encomiums passed upon him. The knowledge of orchestral combination, the contrapuntal skill displayed no less in the instrumental than in the vocal parts, and, above all, the ease and grace of the melodies, together with the poetic feeling which underlies it, all set the seal of nobility upon 'The Rose of Sharon.'"

DAILY NEWS.

"It is one of the most important works of its class that has been produced for many years, and will doubtless speedily find wide acceptance."

MORNING POST.

"Mr. Mackenzie has produced a work which will make a distinct mark in his own career, as well as in the history of modern music. . . . It is the most remarkable endeavour of a high character which has as yet been achieved by an Englishman, and as such it deserved the enthusiastic reception which was accorded to it at the conclusion."

DAILY CHRONICLE.

"Considered from any aspect, 'The Rose of Sharon' is same rapturous ovation repeated. The excited assemblage a credit to British musical art, and as such should be cultivated in public esteem."

same rapturous ovation repeated. The excited assemblage should be cultivated in public esteem."

ATHENÆUM.

"The composer has put forth his full strength, and has not only surpassed everything he has previously done, but in our deliberate opinion has produced by far the finest oratorio ever written by an Englishman. . . . By his new achievement Mr. Mackenzie has placed himself at the head of living English composers, and shown the possession of genius as distinguished from highly cultivated talent."

ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

"'The Rose of Sharon' contains much beautiful and impressive music. The vocal writing—both for the soloists and the chorus—is fluent and effective; the orchestral details being throughout full of picturesque colouring and contrast."

WEEKLY DISPATCH.

"This has been a red-letter day for English music. Among the company of young composers who are striving successfully to raise the musical status of the country, Mr. A. C. Mackenzie may be accorded the foremost place, and he has now gained a conspicuous triumph in the most difficult branch of the art—namely, oratorio."

SUNDAY TIMES.

"It was listened to from the first note to the last, not only with patience and rapt attention, but with a delight which the audience could not at times refrain from showing. The interest of the story, the charm and the grandeur of the music, the excellence of the performance—all combined to impress upon the hearer one simple but decisive opinion, that 'The Rose of Sharon' is a magnificent work, and brings fresh honour to English art and additional fame to its gifted composer."

NORWIGH ARGUS.

"The scene of enthusiasm witnessed in St. Andrew's Hall on the termination of Thursday morning's performance has probably never been equalled in the history of the Norwich Festival. . . . Again and again was Mr. Mackenzie recalled to the platform, and each time was the same rapturous ovation repeated. The excited assemblage shouted with delight, and assuredly, we repeat, put in a 'best on record' in the way of festival receptions."

the fact that they possess a very fine tone and sustain the voice admirably. I have used Pianos by all the leading manufacturers, but I consider your instruments fully equal in every respect to any made, and I shall take every opportunity of recommending them.

Yours truly,

Prima Donna of Her Majesty's Theatre.

I consider that Messrs. Challen & Son have succeeded in providing, at a most moderate cost, Pianos of high-class workmanship and pure tone. The instruments exhibited by Messrs. Challen & Son in Paris were highly creditable, not only to them but to the English Section.

JOHN STAINER, M.A., Mus. Doc., Hon. R.A.M., F.C.O., English Juror at the Paris Universal Exhibition, 1878.

The Pianos of Messrs. Challen & Son possess every good quality. They are exceedingly moderate in price, and I can testify, from personal experience, to their great durability.

GEORGE GARRETT, M.A., Mus. Doc., Cantab.

I can testify, in the strongest manner, to the qualities of the Pianos manufactured by Messrs. Challen & Son. In every point as to touch and tone they are excellent; and I can also certify, from experience, as to their durability under hard wear.

W. H. MONK,

Editor of Hymns Ancient and Modern.

I hold a very high opinion of Messrs. Challen & Son's Pianos. Their qualities of touch and tone can be at once estimated; but I can furthermore bear testimony to their great durability. They are in my opinion unsurpassed if not unequalled.

SIR HENRY BISHOP'S OPERAS

By F. CORDER.

THE name of Sir Henry Bishop, though a house-hold word in the ears of all English lovers of music, is not associated by the present generation with any kind of stage entertainment, save that one or two of his most hackneyed songs are occasionally dragged into feeble operettas, where their undying freshness and vigour present only a too glaring contrast to the flaccidity of their surroundings. We all know "Bid me discourse," "Tell me, my heart," "Should he upbraid," and I fancy that a few of my readers must have heard "Home, sweet Home" and "My pretty Jane." Thanks to the admirable cheap editions of Messrs. Novello, nearly the whole of the contents of Sir Henry Bishop's nine volumes of collected Glees and Choruses are not only extant but in the highest degree popular in the present day. But his operas? Why, these are his operas, or at least, the best and largest portion of them.

I suppose that most of my readers are aware that until about half a century ago opera in England meant nothing more nor less than a farce or melodrama with just so many songs and choruses stuck in as the piece would bear without being absolutely killed by them. Owing to this pleasing and artistic method of procedure the only chance of immortality for a work was for one of the two component parts, play or music, to be very good and the other very bad; the two elements were utterly incongruous and could not survive together to a more enlightened age. Such invertebrate pieces as "The Quaker,"
"The Waterman," and "No Song, no Supper," have lived through their music, while the "Forest of Bondy," "The Miller and his Men," and many other excellent plays have been completely divested of their unnecessary music, and enjoyed long lives as melo-dramas pure and simple. This is another proof of the truth of Wagner's oft-made assertion that the old form of opera-a play with incidental music-is an incongruity and an anomaly. Music and drama may be excellent separately, but it is just when they are excellent separately that they refuse to unite, and, when forced into conjunction, are both inartistic and unsuccessful. To begin with a few biographical details, it may here be stated that Henry Bishop was born in London on November 18, 1786, and died at the age of over 68, on April 30, 1855. His first production was an operetta, played at Margate in 1804, and his last an ode for the installation of the Earl of Derby as Chancellor of Oxford in 1853, scarcely a subject which "yearned for musical expression," but it procured him his degree of Mus. Doc., a distinction which doubtless cheered his last days.

Bishop's works for the stage, consisting of ballets, operas of various calibre, and arrangements, testify to his industry, being about ninety in number. The following is a complete chronological list:-

1804, Angelina (Operetta). 1806, Tamerlan and Bajazet (Ballet), Narcisse et les Graces (Ballet), Love in a Tub (Ballet), Caractacus (Opera). 1808, The Mysterious Bride. 1809, The Circassian Bride, Mora's Love, The Vintagers. 1810, The Maniac, or the Swiss Banditti. 1811, The Knight of Snowdon (Lady of the Lake). 1812, The Renegade, The Æthiop, The Virgin of the Sun. 1813, Haroun Alraschid, The Miller and his Men, Harry le Roy, For England ho! The Brazen Bust. 1814, The Farmer's Wife, The Wandering Boys, Sadak and Kalasrade, The Forest of Bondy, The Maid of the Mill (additions), Doctor Sangrado, The Grand Alliance, John of Paris (adaptation). 1815, The Noble Outlaw, Brother and Sister, Telemachus, The Maid Outlaw, Brother and Sister, Felemachus, Ine Maid and the Magpie, Cymon (additional music), Comus (additional music). 1816, A Midsummer Night's Dream, Who wants a wife? Guy Mannering. 1817, The Heir of Verona, The Libertine (Mozart's Don Giovanni, adapted), The Humorous Lieutenant, The Duke of Savoy, A Father and his children. 1818, The Barber of Seville (adaptation), Marriage of Macht. The Figaro (adaptation), Zuma, or the Tree of Health, The Illustrious Traveller, December and May. 1819, The Heart of Midlothian, Fortunatus, A Rowland for an Oliver, Swedish Patriotism, The Gnome King, an Oliver, Swedish Patriotism, The Gnome King, Comedy of Errors. 1820, The Antiquary, Twelfth Night, Henri Quatre, The Battle of Bothwell Brig. 1821, Don John, Two Gentlemen of Verona. 1822, The Law of Java, Montrose, Maid Marian. 1823, Clari, or the Maid of Milan, Cortez, The Beacon of Liberty. 1824, My Native Land, Charles the Second. 1825, The Fall of Algiers, Angelina (re-written), Coronation of Charles X., Edward the Black Prince. 1826, Aladdin (Fairy Opera), The Knights of the Cross, An Englishman in India. 1830, Adelaide, Under the Oak, Hofer (adaptation), The Tyrolese Peasant. 1832, Home, sweet home! The Magic Fan, A Bottle of Champagne, The Sedan Chair, The Romance of a Day. 1833, Yelva, The Rencontre. 1834, Rural Felicity. 1836, The Doom Kiss, Manfred. 1841, The Fortunate Isles.

I need offer no excuses for reprinting a catalogue of so much interest. It will probably call up many an old and pleasant memory in the minds of some of my older readers. Of the music to the Shakespearian plays only some half-a-dozen songs and glees survive, partly because the rest were mostly interpolations, the text of the poet having been sadly cut about and added to in order to suit the supposed taste of the period. The "Midsummer Night's Dream," for instance, was made quite an opera of between Bishop and Dr. Arne. The adaptations from Mozart, Rossini, and others were often terrible perversions of the originals. Some of the most popular glees were composed for the dramatic versions of Sir Walter Scott's novels. Of these, "Guy Mannering" alone is still played, in a mutilated condition. It is in this that the favourite glee, "A fox jumped over the parson's gate," occurs, the words of which are so nonsensical apart from their dramatic context. "The Knight of Snowdon," a spectacular drama, founded on the "Lady of the Lake," contained the famous "Tramp Chorus." If any of my readers possess THE MUSICAL TIMES of just twenty years ago they will there find an interesting series of articles, by Sir G. A. Macfarren, on Sir Henry Bishop's "Complete collection of Glees and Part-Songs," detailing the entire contents of the nine volumes and giving the name of the play or opera in which each piece originally occurred. I cannot of course go over the same ground again, nor is it necessary. To give an account of all the ninety works of Bishop would not even be possible, many having had only a transient existence, the music of the majority never having been printed, and the librettos (if we may so term them) possessing but scant interest. Some general remarks on the more interesting, and an analysis of a couple as samples of the rest, may, however, be permitted.

I must take this opportunity of observing that our standing reproach of being an unmusical nation would be best removed by our exhibiting a little more respect for, and interest in, our acknowledged great masters of the past. True, the Purcell Society has endeavoured to resuscitate some of the works of our most eminent musician, without the slightest encouragement from outside; but when we look abroad and see the great firm of Breitkopf and Härtel preparing complete editions of the hopelessly dead and gone works of Palestrina, Carissimi, and actually the fifty or more operas of Grétry, in full score, when we see Societies even in Sweden, Norway, and other minor musical countries founded to encourage and publish national music, we cannot but wonder that England could not find subscribers enough to justify the publication (even in pianoforte score) of at least the works of Bishop. There is a wealth of melody, a fertility in choral devices, and, above all, an English national character about his music which renders it at once a lesson and a delight. The singular weakness of construction observable in many of his concerted pieces arose from no ignorance of the laws of musical form but from pure carelessness, a rather strange thing in so good a musician. Scarcely more than a dozen of his operas have ever been published in complete vocal score, though single pieces from nearly all go to make up the "Complete Collection of Glees." That much of what still remains in MS. is equal to the published pieces I affirm most emphatically from personal acquaintance with many of the works. "Zuma," "The Maniac," "Henri Quatre," and others have songs of great beauty which have never been reprinted, though the vocal scores of these particular three operas were indeed published at the time of their performance. I have a vivid remembrance of the fine music to "Manfred," used by the late Mr. Phelps in the splendid Drury Lane revival of that work. This is, however, among the lost works, having, I believe, been accidentally burnt at the theatre. This fate also overtook one of Bishop's first and greatest successes, "The Circassian Bride," which was produced on February 23, 1809, and received with much enthusiasm; the theatre was burnt to the ground the following night, and much valuable music perished in the flames.

"Love in a tub," one of Bishop's first ballets, may still be met with, being a stock piece with pantomimists (or "Variety knockabouts," as I believe they now style themselves); it is a sort of classic, like the German piece of buffoonery, "Hirsch in der Tanzstunde," but I know not whether the original music remains to it.

"The Maniac," which has the absurd sub-title of "The Swiss Banditti," is full of good music, out of which may be singled the well-known chorus "The tiger couches in the wood" (in Switzerland!). I would give much to find a copy of this play, for among other extraordinary things there are some Swiss fishermen who sing about "roaming the ocean," and seem to be a kind of pirates. One would be glad to know at what part of the coast of Switzerland they landed.

"The Heir of Verona," "The Maid of the Mill,"
"Brother and Sister," and many others, are only partly by Bishop, having been supplied with extra songs (probably at the demand of the singers) by Whittaker, Reeve, and other composers.

"Clari," a very maudlin domestic drama, will for ever remain famous by the fact of "Home, sweet home," having been its principal number; in fact, the piece seems written up to the song.

The most important operas in our long list are the following: "The Maniac," "The Farmer's Wife," "Zuma," "The Gnome King," "Henri Quatre," "The Law of Java," "Maid Marian," "The Fall of Algiers," "Aladdin," and "The Doom Kiss." I include "Aladdin" on account of its ambitious scope, but it was one of Bishop's few decided failures. It was composed in opposition to Weber's "Oberon" when this work was under order for the rival house of Covent Garden, and though written with the utmost pains to eclipse the "foreigner," it was hopelessly worsted in the competition. In spite of all Bishop's earnestness, or perhaps because of it, "Aladdin" shows little of the vigour and brightness so conspicuous in many works which were merely dashed off as required. It is, indeed, a curiously disappointing work.

"The Law of Java" has for its opening glee the famous "Mynheer van Dunk," the words of which have been so exquisitely Bowdlerized for the use of ladies as-

We fairies gay At set of day.

We will now give a detailed description of a couple of the plays which Bishop supplied with music, the musical melo-drama of "The Miller and his men," by Pocock, and the opera of "Zuma," by Dibdin, serving as general types. If in these degenerate days there are any among my readers who have in their childhood indulged in the rapturous delights of a model theatre, and who feel yet a sweet thrill of remembrance at the name of Skelt, these will not need much reminder of the first of these two pieces. But, for the benefit of the benighted ones, a sketch of that once famous drama is necessary.

Though "The Miller and his men" is entirely English in character, the scene is laid somewhere in Germany, the names of the characters preserving that delightful vagueness of nationality which is a feature of all old plays. Grindoff, a rich miller, is really the chief of a band of robbers who infest the country. He vainly woos Claudine, the daughter of Kelmar, an old peasant in reduced circumstances. Of course she has a peasant lover, Lothair, who, to win money and his love, joins the robbers with the intention of betraying them. Meanwhile, some of the band "burgle" Kelmar's cottage, with the double object of carrying off the maiden and robbing Count Friberg, who is benighted there whilst travelling. The former purpose is successful; the latter is frustrated, and leads to a pursuit of the marauders. Kelmar suspects Grindoff, and, wildly seizing him by the throat, discovers that his innocent miller's smock covers a breastplate of mail. The secret is then out, and Count Friberg besieges the mill with his soldiers. Grindoff threatens to fire his powder magazine and blow everyone to atoms, but the faithful Lothair saves Claudine, and so the robbers are satisfactorily exploded by themselves. Such is the sweet and simple story of the piece, with which, it is scarcely necessary to state, the music has little connection. The admirable round, "When the wind blows," opens the piece, and is one of Bishop's most vigorous inspirations. The situation is slightly absurd. The scene shows a perspective landscape, with a lake at the back, and the windmill (with sails to work) in the far distance. A boat is seen to put off with two or three men and their sacks of flour. On their landing (I am speaking of the fine Drury Lane revival of 1866) these two or three men have multiplied into about twenty (a large gang for one mill), who advance to the footlights, sing their chorus, and then walk off, to be no more seen till the next chorus, which takes place in the robbers' cave. As they carouse (for robbers must always carouse) they sing a very lively chorus, "Fill, boys, and drink about," which is more in keeping with the situation than usual. The second robbers' chorus (in Act 2), "Now to the forest we repair," is not nearly so characteristic, though an Indians relent, disclose the secret, become Christians, excellent piece of music in itself. The only other vocal number is the sestet "Stay, prithee stay! which really has some connection with the dialogue of the piece, if not with its plot. It occurs in the scene in Kelmar's cottage, when Claudine and her father dissuade Count Friberg and his comic servant Karl from continuing their journey through the storm. Pretty as this piece undoubtedly is, its weakness of construction and jaunty character, ill suited to the situation, prevent our according it high praise.

Were I not dealing with the music rather than the drama, I could say much of the unintended comicalities which abound in "The Miller and his men," as in most melo-dramas. One anecdote, however, I must take leave to relate, though it has nothing to do with

At the Drury Lane revival the part of Lothair was played by young P., who was notoriously uncertain about his words. Mr. R., who played Kelmar, gravely warned him, with mischievous intent, just before the piece began, that there was one of his first lines which no Lothair had ever yet delivered correctly, and offered to bet that P. would break down. The words in the part were-

Though you may prevent my following her, you cannot prevent my loving her.

Of course, the warning made Lothair nervous, as was intended, and on arriving at the fatal line he caught Kelmar's eye fixed expectantly on him, stammered and paused just sufficiently to attract the attention of the audience, and then broke out desperatelywhich absurd perversion, I was told, he found himself forced to make every succeeding night.

Old man, you may prevent my loving her, but you cannot prevent my following her.

A parallel to this ludicrous persistence in a conscious blunder is afforded by the case of a well-known lady singer of the present day, who told me that she found herself compelled to give up singing "Kathleen Mavourneen," her favourite song, because having once been told of a singer who perverted the words-

the blue mountains glow

the glue mountains blow

she found herself invincibly impelled to make the same distortion; if she resisted the impulse she inevitably burst out laughing and spoilt the song that

"Zuma, or the Tree of Health," is a more pretentious, and therefore more amusing work than "The Miller and his men," being dignified with the name of opera, and containing some sixteen musical numbers by Bishop, besides extra songs by Braham. The story is taken from one of a set of old French moral tales, which are one of the earliest remembrances of my childhood. Indeed, its dramatic character struck us children even in those days, and we adapted it as one of our first nursery plays, the Peruvian native dresses being a great attraction. The plot turns upon the vain endeavours of the conquered Peruvians to keep from the Spaniards their last possession, the secret healing virtues of the chinchona bark. Zuma, a native girl in the service of the vice-queen, endeavours to secretly heal her beloved mistress, who is attacked by malaria, and, being discovered, is accused of poisoning her. The Indians refuse to save her by declaring the true nature of the dose, and Zuma is about to be burnt. Here Dibdin departs from the original, and makes all end happily through the stale old device of the comic servant, who has climbed up a tree and accidentally overheard a conference of the Indians on the subject. The original ending (and that of our own drama) is that the and the whole company take a dose of quinine all round, which would form a thrilling subject for a

The printed libretto has a preface which will, I doubt not, find a sympathetic echo in the hearts of all librettists, though I cannot see that in this particular instance the composer has been very exacting. It is as follows:—

ADVERTISMENT.—To that Liberal Public which has sanctioned so many of the Author's previous attempts, he ventures to say, in defence of his Intentions with regard to the present Opera, that it has been so transformed, transposed, and altered in various ways, for the sake, no doubt, of improved musical subjects and situations, that it may not be improperly compared to the production of a provincial Scene-painter, who, having commenced the representation of a Grove, was so assailed with hints, commands, and advice from every part of the Theatre that, in consequence of unavoidable acquiescence with all, his intended Landscape became a Street.

This is truly cutting, and a little further on the fettered genius utters another remonstrance in the shape of a footnote.

The irregularity of measure of several of the songs has been occasioned by adaptation of the words to music, in lieu of retaining those better attempts at verse which belonged to and grew out of the Story of the Piece.

In truth, some apology is needed for the exceeding feebleness of the "attempts at verse." The list of characters is a rather large one, but this is owing to the fact that then, as now, few of the good actors could sing, and none of the good singers could act, so that a number of small parts were necessary. The principal characters are Mivran, husband of Zuma; Ximo, his father; Azan, his enemy; Doctor Bonoro, a Spanish physician; Cæsar, a black servant; Oriana, the vice-queen; and Zuma, her attendant; but there are eleven other persons of minor importance.

The overture is not so interesting as many of Bishop's ("The Maniac," "Law of Java," &c.), but it is a fair piece of work, though a mere pot-pourri of the leading melodies. The chief of these are the striking concerted piece in the last scene, "Daughter of error," and the Peruvian March, in which a slight attempt at "local colour" may be discerned. The following is the theme of the latter, played in unison:—

The first scene, a wild landscape in a Peruvian forest, with the famous tree of health in the centre of the stage, opens with a pretty glee, "The silver queen," which in general outline somewhat resembles the "Chough and crow." The second number, which occurs at the assembling of the natives, begins with the Peruvian March, in which the chorus joins. The libretto runs thus:—

Chorus, commencing by a sort of whisper and swells by a gradual crescendo to a burst of grandeur and terrific effect.

Soft let the Lamla sound
To guide our cautious feet,
And then each tribe around
The muffled Bam-bam beat.

The poet appends a naïve footnote:—"The author has most respectfully to apologise for these imaginary names of Peruvian instruments." Although a very pretty chorus there is no sign of any "burst of grandeur and terrific effect," the composer thus neglecting the poet's intention most reprehensibly. After one or two unimportant numbers we come to a sort of comic song for Dr. Bonoro, a commendable piece in its way, though the humour, needless to say, is very feeble. The finale to the first Act, where a sort of garden fite at the viceregal palace is taking place, is rather elaborate, consisting first of a dance measure, "Let the lively banja play" (more imaginary instruments!), succeeded by a pretty unaccompanied trio and a final concerted movement of considerable spirit.

In the second Act the villain of the piece (a very mild one), Azan, has a good bass song about "Fell revenge." Then there is another terrible comic song for the black servant, Casar, with the highly intelligent refrain of—which it is really difficult to imagine any sane audience listening to and not rising in their wrath to demolish the theatre. Then comes an elaborate concerted piece, the words of which really call for quotation, but the situation which they illustrate must first be explained.

Zuma's child has been carried off by a minor character, Picquillo; why it is needless here to state. Picquillo loses his way in a gold mine (!) the tunnel of which conducts him to a pit in the viceroy's garden. Casar hears him call for help and clambers down. He presently rescues the infant but leaves Picquillo, for reasons not explained. Meanwhile, a comic scene, hardly in the best of taste, occurs between Dr. Bonoro and an elderly demoiselle d'honneur. Aspersions are cast upon the lady's character and she invokes the foul fiend to come and remove her if there is any truth in the slander. At this moment Casar rises from the ground at their feet with the child in his arms, causing the lady to scream and faint. The concerted piece then begins—

Cæsar.
What de matter, lady bright?
Pickaninny do no harm.

Doctor.

Sure, I can't believe my sight!
"Twould Old Nick himself alarm.
By rising up thus, like a sprite from the grave, You've killed the old lady, you devil, you have!

Casar.

Massa Doctor, true met ell
How it happen all.
Down de weil
Me tink him fell,
Moder, loud him call.

Down below,
Fetch him up, dat all!
Picquillo (beneath).

What joy thus regaining their beautiful child!
This is obviously 'one of those better attempts at verse, which belonged to and grew out of the story of the piece." And such was the balderdash which composers up to a very recent date used to deliberately set to music!

In the last Act two solos for Zuma deserve mention, and we must not forget the highly effective chorus, "Daughter of error," which occurs when the heroine is being led to execution. The unusual course is taken of lighting the fire before tying the victim to the stake, which would probably cause a difficulty were not the execution stayed by the appearance of Picquillo and Dr. Bonoro, who explain all, the opera then ending with a chorus of joy, two verses of which deserve reproduction here, for their beauty of rhyme and perspicacity of sentiment.

Doctor.

But render good for ill,
And change to a laurel
Our green tree of health.

Mirvan.
With rapture o'erflowing,

The libretto of "Zuma" is by no means an unusually bad specimen of its class. It is only literally true that in those days they sang what was too silly to be spoken; is the book of "The Bohemian Girl," to say nothing of other comparatively modern operas, any more sensible or poetic?

Before concluding, I would call attention to the admirable way in which Sir Henry Bishop writes the accompaniments to his choruses. The violins, instead of merely playing the melody, usually have brilliant semiquaver passages in the higher octaves, thus giving a life and animation which many composers would do well to emulate. His scores are rather oddly arranged, the instruments being thus placed:-Timpani, tromboni, trombe, corni, clarinetti, flauti, oboi, fagotti, violini, &c. The reason for placing the clarinets out of their usual position being far from obvious. The music paper of the period seldom having more than twelve staves when there were many voice parts, the less important instruments were written out in a supplement at the end of the piece, a procedure which made it impossible for the conductor to know whether the players came in rightly or not. The instrumentation is simple, but always good and effective, the composer being shrewdly alive to the fact that he was writing for an orchestra of mediocre powers and a small body of strings. Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co. are now printing the band parts to many of Bishop's glees from the original scores as far as these can be got at, for the MS. parts hitherto used are quite incorrect, having probably been vamped up by various hands from the pianoforte score to save the trouble and expense of hiring original copies. If they could find it worth while to reprint the vocal scores of, say, a dozen, at least, of the best operas, with the spoken text, they would do a good service to the cause of art; but I fear that this is impracticable, for there is such a flood of contemporary music imperatively demanding purchase that we do not feel justified in spending our money upon classics of value only to the curious. And with us English, when we have settled the matter in its pecuniary aspect, there is no more to be said. But what about starting a Bishop Society?

OBSERVATIONS ON MUSIC IN AMERICA

By Joseph Bennett. II.—Church music.

In touching upon this subject, I must first of all take into account certain facts which lie a long way back. The United States stand almost alone among civilised nations in not possessing a tradition of Church music. European communities without exception have inherited this from the past; we in England certainly not less than our neighbours. From the time when our stately cathedrals arose to represent the piety and artistic feeling of an age we sometimes call "dark," each mother church has kept extant amongst us the principles and practice of a high order of sacred song. We need not, however, go back farther than the Reformation for the purpose in view. With the establishment of an English Church professing a reformed faith, a new era began in the history of English Church music. All the glory of that era—there is much of it—we inherit, and though, even in this branch of the art, changes are at work, its standard is still sustained by Tallis and Gibbons, Purcell and Croft, and their many compeers. Puritanism was as much a rebellion against Church music as against any other practice of the Establishment. True, it sang Psalms, as after the battle of Dunbar. "'The Lord General made a halt,' says Hodgson, 'and sang the 117th Psalm, till our horse could gather for the chase.' Hundred and seventeenth Psalm, at the foot of the Doon Hill; there we uplift it to the tune of Bangor or some still higher score, and roll it strong and great against the sky."*

No doubt the Barebones Parliament sang lustily and with good courage during its frequent religious exercises in St. Margaret's Church at Westminster. But, without slandering any of these participants in mighty events, whose thunders have reverberated through all following time, we may express a doubt whether Puritanic psalmody deserved to be called music. Puritanism smashed organs, or burnt the cases and melted the leaden pipes for bullets; it lit fires with treasures from Cathedral libraries, dispersed the singing men and boys, and reduced the service of song to the level at which some Scottish Presbyterians are still content it should remain. Afterwards even psalmody became an abomination and a loathing to our stern protestors, who banished it, as an unclean thing, from their places of worship, or compromised with more tolerant brethren and left the chapel, while those brethren, like their Divine Lord and His disciples, "sang an hymn." Out of the midst of these people proceeded the founders of the Anglo-Saxon community beyond the Atlantic.

Expanding from groups of colonists animated by bitter prejudice against the acceptance of any artistic sacrifice at the altar of religion, the great Western republic started, as regards church music, on almost hopeless terms. It had no standard of merit or method, and its growth, in this respect, has been determined by chance or vagary. Hence the poor character of much of the music heard in American churches, and the strange ideas which prevail with regard to what constitutes public praise. Let me not forget to say here that some good work has been done for improvement by individual Americans. The late Lowell Mason, though by no means a gifted composer, had a true conception of what church music should be, and laboured hard to make his countrymen appreciate it. Mason died years ago, but a great deal remains to be achieved before even his modest standard of congregational singing is reached. Let any English musician open a book of American church music and he will be astonished at the mass of common-place stuff that seems to have found favour with congregations. It can only be compared with the effusions which industrious English compilers in the last century used to obtain from obscure sources for the benefit of Dissenters. From the scope of these remarks two exceptions must be made. First, they do not apply to that curious institution, the quartet choir and its repertory. American quartet choirs are generally composed of efficient singers, and possess a copious, ambitious, and often miscellaneous repertory not unaffected by one its persistence mattered little, and the volunthe theory that it is wrong to let the devil have all the pretty tunes. The second exception is found within the fold of the Episcopal Church. Unhappily, the American branch of the Church of England numbers, comparatively speaking, but a handful of adherents. It has only hundreds where Baptists and Methodists are counted by the million. Still, there it is, a little leaven in the middle of a great lump, and within its places of worship may often be found a musical service as excellent as any of those concerning which Englishmen think themselves entitled to boast. It may be due to the example and influence of the Episcopal Church that English worship-music is more and more extensively used. Wherever I went, in the course of my recent tour. I found the English church-composer represented, and I was assured that his popularity is constantly growing.

I should weary my patient reader were I to give particulars concerning every church visited by me. Enough if I deal with three or four of special interest, beginning with Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, so long famous as the scene of Mr. Henry Ward Beecher's labours.

Not having the advantage of previous knowledge, I crossed the wonderful Brooklyn Bridge, on one bright November Sunday, with great expectations. Surely this was natural enough. Plymouth Church is the goal of many a pilgrimage; the fame of its pastor has gone forth into all lands, and his words unto the ends of the earth. Every stranger, to whom religious things are of any concern whatever, visits Plymouth Church, hoping that he may be lucky enough to get his foot over the threshold, and his ear within the range of Mr. Beecher's voice. Having all this in mind, together with the fact that the church has a princely revenue, I looked for a model service in things musical as in other. There was, of course, the previous question of obtaining admission at all. The Presidential election had just been decided by the defeat of the Republican candidate, and Plymouth Church is Republican or nothing. Moreover, Mr. Beecher had himself done no little towards the rejection of Mr. Blaine. In some sort he was the head of the "Mug-wumps"—as Republican traitors were called—and, in that character, had incurred the bitterest wrath of a disappointed party. Would he, from the pulpit, retort upon his adversaries, and meet with spirit an angry congregation? For satisfaction on these points, there was a special rush that morning. By good fortune, however, I gained an entrance through the "stage door" of the establishment.

Plymouth Church is plain enough for the sturdiest descendant of a Pilgrim Father. The Saturday Review used frequently, in its bold, bad way, to jeer at "Dissenter's Gothic," but at Brooklyn there is no pretence of architecture save that of the convenient and humble barn. Only the organ transgresses in this respect; raising, in the gallery behind the platform, a huge lumbering mass of wood and pipes, designed as to outline and detail after some classic model. In front of it, and on either flank, sat the choir, numbering, perhaps, forty or fifty voices. The congregation flocked in quickly, talking politics; many of them wearing their hats as far as the pew door, in the fashion I have seen English Dissenters of the sterner sort affect. Meanwhile, the organist, Mr. Walter Damrosch (son of the late regretted Dr. Leopold Damrosch), extemporised a voluntary decidedly modern in character; a single phrase being worked through various metamorphoses, and presented amid many diverse harmonic cir-tary may be described as clever and effective. At its close, the choir stood up for an opening anthem, but not the congregation, who maintained, throughout the performance, a sitting and a complacently critical attitude. This seems to be the normal state of the congregation at Plymouth Church. They are preached to, and prayed for, and they like to do their praise by proxy, save after the sermon, when one may suppose that gratitude for a pulpit orator like Mr. Beecher brings them to their feet and opens their mouth in song. The anthem was a poor composition by some American musician, whose name I did not think it worth while to obtain. Its performance, conducted by Mr. Damrosch-an assistant playing the accompaniment with neither taste nor skill-proved to be fairly good, according to an amateur standard, and I only regret that Mr. Damrosch did not know of my coming, because, in that case-as he was good enough to assure me-he would have chosen a work better in itself, and more efficient as a test of the choir. The remainder of the musical service, with a single exception, consisted of hymns, the performance of which, like that of the anthem, had the help of Mr. Walter Damrosch's bâton. I can spare myself the trouble of making remarks upon the collection of tunes used in Plymouth Church, because that morning Mr. Beecher gave the best possible proof of a desire for some-thing better. Holding a new book in his hand, the reverend gentleman made a short address to the congregation, explaining why a supplementary collection of tunes had been adopted. Almost of course, he deprecated total abandonment of the old one. Whatever their musical merits, the familiar tunes had, he said, won a place, not only in the memory, but in the heart of the people, and were not lightly to be disturbed. I looked over the Supplement, then for the first time introduced, and found its contents very largely derived from English sources, well chosen, and adapted to raise the character of Plymouth Church music precisely where elevation is most needed. It may be of interest to add that a tune by Mr. Joseph Barnby was selected for the inauguration of the new book. The hymn, sung congregationally, had an effect which strongly reminded me of the Weigh House Chapel service when the late Rev. Thomas Binney officiated in that now nonexistent edifice. Mr. Binney drew around him a congregation largely composed of men; so does Mr. Beecher, and the sonorous majesty of a thousand male voices gave character to the musical service in the one place as now it does in the other. I cannot imagine why Mr. Beecher's people do not take the praise of their Zion into their own hands. No greater contrast was possible than between the coldness and apathy of the hymns sung by a small choir to a seated congregation, and the warmth and life of the one hymn whose strains were borne aloft on the strength of the whole upstanding mass of worshippers. I have spoken above of an exception to hymnody. This had place during a short baptismal service, which, after a very old fashion, formed an episode in the larger act of the congregation. Here the choir, without organ accompaniment, softly chanted some texts of Scripture with touching effect, and supplied the one feature that lifted the proceedings above a very ordinary level.

of the sterner sort affect. Meanwhile, the organist, Mr. Walter Damrosch (son of the late regretted Dr. Leopold Damrosch), extemporised a voluntary decidedly modern in character; a single phrase being worked through various metamorphoses, Sunday ears. force myself to regard their doings as other than a kind of divertissement thrown in for some relief to the religious proceedings. I repel the charge of uncharitableness on this account, since who could look on the well-dressed congregation-with ladies resplendent in diamonds—as they sat listening to the picked singers in their pay, and associate them with an act of worship? It is said that the quartet choir is going out of fashion, and for a long time past many American voices have been lifted up against it. The institution will die, unwept and unhonoured, save, perhaps, by those who, looking mainly to the interests of the musical profession, regret the loss of an opportunity for advancement such as cannot easily be replaced. I now ask my reader to go with me into the "wild West," to the youthful City of Denver, in Colorado. Denver sprang into existence about twenty-six years ago-that is to say, when adventurers began to dig and delve for ore in the adjacent Rocky Mountains. It had a turbulent youth, like most far Western towns, and was considered eminently "unhealthy" in the far Western sense, which connects that term with pistol shots and bowie stabs. The place is not wholly staid and sober even now; occasion arising, from time to time, for a kind of informal purge, when authority warns objectionable elements that their room is more to be desired than their company. A stranger, however, might live in Denver some time and have no cause to suspect this, the appearance of the town being that of a steady, industrious and prosperous community, some 50,000 strong. As an example of rapid growth Denver is a marvel. Where the buffalo roamed a quarter of a century ago, and where, later, stood rows of unsightly wooden shanties, are now streets of noble houses, with shops that would do credit to Paris or London. The public edifices are numerous and imposing, and at the head of those devoted to religious uses stands an Episcopal Cathedral, a spacious Lombardo-Gothic edifice, which—though by no means suggestive of a Cathedral in Europe-is an architectural success. Thither, on the Sunday before last Christmas day, I plunged, rather than walked, through fast falling snow, that shut out the light of heaven, but could not deaden the sound of merry sleigh-bells. Concerning the musical service awaiting me I had no pre-conceived ideas, though the circumstances of an isolated town in the midst of a vast, scarcely settled region, did not encourage sanguine hopes. Here, however, I was again reminded that the unexpected always happens. As a matter of fact, the service in Denver Cathedral that morning was one of the best that ever came under my observation. The Organist, Mr. Damrosch—another son of the late professor in New York played an excellent instrument with much taste as well as executive facility; and the choir of boys and men-properly vested in cassocks and surplices-did the greatest credit to the precentor, Mr. Stevenson, who is, I believe, an Englishman. A better choir I do not expect to hear, either as regards quality of tone or precision and delicacy of execution. Everything they attempted, from the processional hymn to the recessional, was thoroughly well done, and in a reverent spirit; following in all respects the English model. The congregation joined in the responses, chants, and hymns; but the choir had, of course, the anthem to themselves, and I only regret that my late friend, Sir John Goss, is not now amongst us to be assured that his "O taste and see how gracious the Lord is" was perfectly given in that far-away place. At the time of evening service I again made my way through now dark, deserted, snowed-up avenues to the church which had impressed garding the composition and capacity of the Careless me as a phenomenon, and found the same excellence Orchestra I cannot speak, but, perhaps, some of its displayed in Handel's "And the glory of the Lord," the boys here taking up their points with remarkable firmness and precision. Nothing, in fine, could have been better than the day's doings, morning and evening, and I hereby send my congratulations, over five thousand intervening miles, to Mr. Damrosch and Mr. Stevenson, whose acquaintance I now regret that I did not make. It is impossible to over-estimate the influence for good of such musical services as those in Denver. They, at least, afford America a standard of merit, and I have the best right to believe that they are by no means uncommon in the larger cities of the Union.

Farther west still, if the reader pleases; this time to the wonderful city which stands at the foot of its encompassing mountains, a monument of Mormon energy and faith. "Gentile" belief and practices have now a firm footing in the Sion founded by Brigham Young and the dauntless band who started with him from Nauvoo into the then unknown wilds of Northern Mexico. Probably the Mormons would not have it so if they could help themselves; but Salt Lake City is under Federal authority, and on a slope of the adjacent mountains stands Fort Douglas, armed with highly persuasive Federal cannon. the world is therefore free to come and go within the territory where Mormonism remains, and promises to remain, the dominant faith. There are several "Gentile" churches in Salt Lake City; Episcopalians, Roman Catholics, Presbyterians, Methodists, Congregationalists, and Baptists having one or more within the shadow of Brigham Young's great Tabernacle. The adherents in each case, however, are comparatively few, and I apprehend that the enterprise of these sects is regarded as bearing a missionary character. We were a small band in one of the Episcopalian churches on Christmas morning last. Pious hands had decorated the pretty little Gothic building with festoons of fir, and many a Scriptural text, but this could not have been done for the admiration of a crowd. Perhaps twenty people, all told, had gathered, when a choir of three young women and two young men, seated round an American organ near the chancel, rose and sang "Hark! the herald angels" to Mendelssohn's wellknown strain. With such humble means only humble things were attempted, the musical service being limited to responses, chants, and hymns. All these were rendered with spirit, and even with some effect. What if the young lady organist occasionally showed inexperience in dealing with extemporised harmonies. The entire proceedings were so hearty, simple, and appropriate to circumstances that I could only regard them as successful. I did this none the less readily because everything served to remind me of an English village church, wherein life reigns rather than the somnolency that is first cousin to death.

My experience of "Gentile" church music began and ended as described above. I shall, perhaps, be expected to dwell longer upon that of the "Latter-Day Saints," of whose artistic doings it was my privilege to make close observation, thanks to the friendly attentions of Mr. Calder, the chief musicseller in the place, and himself not only a Mormon, but the son of one who held high and honoured rank in his Church. Considering all things, especially the work that devolves upon a people engaged in the rougher operations of founding a State, the Mormons make very praiseworthy efforts to secure for themselves the sweetness and light of art. They support an organisation known as the "Careless Orchestra"-a suggestive name, but meaning no more than that a Mr. Careless is its leader. Re-music in the streets of the city during the small hours of Christmas morning. A theatre is also one of the appendages of the Mormon Church. Here the young people who have formed themselves into dramatic associations make public appearances; among the performers being some called by names conspicuous in the short and stormy record of those who followed the Prophet of Nauvoo. The most important musical society is that which forms the Choir of the Tabernacle. It numbers about one hundred and fifty voices, and has been fairly well trained for work making but a moderate demand upon executive power. I attended the Tabernacle service on one occasion, and had then an opportunity of estimating its capacity, under the favourable conditions afforded by a building which, through chance or otherwise, has solved the problem of acoustics in a large place. The Tabernacle has room for near upon 10,000 people, and is elliptical in form, with low walls from which springs a roof unsupported by pillars, and somewhat resembling the inside of the longitudinal section of an egg-shell. At one of the curving ends, rising from the level of the floor to a considerable height, is a capacious platform for the officers of the Church, behind whom, and on either side, are the singers, the huge organ lifting its vast mass in rear of, and above all. Round the building, save as just described, runs a deep gallery, and seats cover the ample area. It is a literal fact that, when the building is empty, a person standing at one end can hear a pin drop at the other. This was demonstrated to me again and again, the impact of the little bit of metal against the floor being distinctly audible. It follows that a preacher need not speak above a conversational pitch in order to be heard all over the place. Even the feeble voice of the aged President, John Taylor, travels to every ear. From this it is easy to imagine the effect of the great organ, and the resonant tones of singers whose vocal powers are kept in strength and vigour by bracing mountain air. The Mormon service is, musically speaking and otherwise, of the plainest character, resembling that of an English dissenting chapel. A curious feature is the almost absolute dumbness of the congregation. They do not sing, the whole duty of vocal praise being delegated to the choir, and they make no responses to the extemporaneous prayers; only when some eloquent orator-and there are many among the Mormonsdwells passionately upon their persecutions and foretells an ultimate triumph, a loud "Amen" rings through the building. The hymns are sung to tunes of an old-fashioned type, such as may be found in Rippon's English collection of sixty or seventy years ago, and in almost every popular American collection of the present day. Even tunes which necessitate repeated lines, and those containing passages of imitation, are not discarded from Mormon use; their spirited and sometimes rather rollicking strains being delivered with every appearance of real enjoyment. choir, as a rule, goes right through the hymn, whatever the number of its verses, while the huge congregation, turning a sea of faces full upon the performers, sit and quietly listen. Sometimes, as on the occasion of my visit, music of a more complex character is attempted. The anthem I heard, for example, contained a short solo, very well delivered by a young Scandinavian professional, to the accompaniment of a small orchestra as well as the organ. By this time the Mormons have amongst them again a young musician (son of the late Brigham Young) who has been trained at our own Royal Academy of Music, and will doubtless make a conspicuous feature in the Tabernacle members were those I heard discoursing solemn dinavian aforesaid, there seems to be no lack of musical talent in the Mormon ranks. I was especially struck with the sopranos, the quality of whose tone, and the ferrour of whose style, suggested the existence of a considerable Welsh element—the more readily because Wales sends to Utah a large number of converts. It is clear that the Latter-Day Saints devote a proper amount of attention to music, regarded as an element in public worship. The fine Tabernacle organ of sixty stops affords, in itself, a proof of this. It was built entirely by Utah mechanics, under the superintendance of Mr. Joseph Ridges, all the material not available on the spot being brought in waggons from the railway terminus, then many hundred miles away, on the other side of the great plains. The instrument, which has three manuals and a powerful pedal organ, is of noble proportions, and contains many excellent stops. It is now, for repair and extension, in the hands of Mr. Johnson, a Scandinavian immigrant, who has himself built a fine two-manual organ in the Mormon Assembly Hall. I am indebted to Mr. Johnson for an opportunity of trying both these instruments, and I regard both as instances of victory over the difficulties presented by a remote and isolated spot where no skilled labour, save that of the builder himself, could be obtained. In the present work of enlarging the Tabernacle instrument I found Mr. Johnson assisted by nobody save a young man, son of President Taylor.

My space is now exhausted, if not my theme. Going from details to deductions, I arrive at no other conclusion than that America, notwithstanding a bad start in Church music, and various present drawbacks, is on the right path and making progress.

THE GREAT COMPOSERS

By Joseph Bennett.

Ar this period (1778) it became a question of Gluck's settlement in Paris, where he had previously been no more than a visitor. He evidently desired to remove thither from Vienna. This we learn from a letter addressed by him to M. Guillard, his librettist at the

"So manage as that the Queen shall demand me only for an indefinite time-for some years-in order that I may gracefully get away from here; but this must be done without loss of time, because I will no longer travel in winter, I would start at the beginning of September, and I must know a couple of months in advance so as to sell my furniture and arrange my affairs.'

This matter remained unsettled in July, since we find the master writing as follows to the Abbé Arnaud :-

"You are quite right, Monsieur, I cannot finish my two operas at Vienna. I must be near the poets, as we do not understand each other very well. I expect to leave here in September if M. de Vismes can obtain the Empress's permission for me to go to Paris. Without that I cannot start, the reasons you may learn from M. le Bailly."

Gluck's reference to a misunderstanding with his poets as one reason for hastening to Paris should not be passed over here. He was the most fastidious of composers in this regard, and would not abate one jot of the principles upon which he had determined as the essential basis of musical drama. Thus the letter to M. Guillard above quoted contains a mass of detail regarding the libretto of "Iphigénie en Tauride." From it we gather that he made his librettist a mere hack, and also that he was invariably services. But, quite apart from him and the Scan- right on the points concerning which he took his collaborateur to task. But can it be that Gluck sometimes prepared his music first and had words written to it? If not, how are we to read the subjoined paragraph?

"As regards the words for which I now ask, I must have a verse of ten syllable lines, and be careful to put a long and sonorous syllable in the places which I have marked. Let your last verse, moreover, be sombre and solemn, if you would have it in accord with my music.'

Interpreted by ordinary rules, this passage certainly reads as though the composer sometimes ran ahead of the poet in true Rossinian fashion.

Having, as we must assume, obtained permission from the Empress, Gluck arrived in Paris in November, bringing with him the score of "Iphigénie in Tauride." The genesis of this work deserves par-The genesis of this work deserves particular attention. It appears that Devisme, the Director of the Opéra, conceived the idea of obtaining a lyric drama on the same subject from each of the two great rivals for the admiration of Paris. As a stroke of business this could not be surpassed, but it demanded no small measure of diplomatic tact, and even at the outset the manager met with a When made acquainted with the project and offered Guillard's book, Gluck would neither listen to the one nor accept the other. He was not going to risk the success of his career upon a formal encounter the issue of which might be decided by incompetent or partial judges. For some time he remained in this frame of mind, and even promised the libretto to Grétry. Devisme, however, managed in the end to conquer his objections, and it may be that Gluck was allured in some measure by the secret hope of so outshining his rival as to set at rest all question of their opposing claims. At this change of mind Grétry was much annoyed; even going so far as to accuse Gluck of cruelly playing fast and loose with his desires. Assured of the German master's co-operation, Devisme proceeded to negotiate with Piccinni. In his Notice sur la vie et les ouvrages de Nicolas Piccinni, Ginguené has preserved a report of the conversation which took place :-

D. Here is an excellent libretto which I propose you should set to music. It is "Iphigénie en Tauride." M. Gluck is composing another, and an impartial public will decide between you. We shall see, as in Italy, two masters writing the same work; it is a plan which I desire to introduce into France.

P. But, Monsieur, for that it is necessary that the poem should be the same.

D. It is not quite the same poem, but the subject and plan are identical.

P. You are not ignorant, Monsieur, of the intrigues and even hatreds which exist against me, without reason on my part. Should the "Iphigénie en Tauride" of M. Gluck be first heard there would be no chance for mine. D. I give you my word that your work shall be produced before his. Give me yours, in turn, that you will speak of this to nobody, not even to your most intimate friends. In this you are yourself concerned, for, if this affair is to produce the effect I anticipate, there must be not the least suspicion of it. Go to work in all confidence. My own judgment and the opinion of many excellent connoisseurs assure me that the book is an excellent one. Begin upon it immediately. Count upon the pledge I have given as to the performance of your opera before Gluck's; I await yours as to the secrecy required.

Piccinni went to work accordingly with closed mouth, and had finished two acts when disquieting who met him with apologies and excuses. Gluck's work was actually in rehearsal, but the manager's hand had been forced; the Queen had given her orders; que voulez vous! In vain Piccinni remonstrated, and urged Devisme to keep his plighted word. All his arguments were met by pleading royal command, and the poor composer retired in despair. This did not prevent him, however, from showing the libretto to Ginguené, who pronounced it a stupid rhapsody, and only after hard persuasion undertook its amendment; the composer having resolved to persevere rather than waste the labour already expended. Meanwhile Gluck's rehearsals went bravely on, he superintending all in his earnest, not to say vociferous, manner. Some one present on a more than usually noisy occasion asked a Piccinnist what he thought of the marvellous music. The partisan answered: "Admirable. I find only one little fault. Every time that Gluck, striking the floor with his cane, cries 'pianissimo!' he ought to say to the orchestra 'tapagissimo!'"

"Iphigénie en Tauride" was produced at the Opéra on May 18, 1779, and achieved a great success, notwithstanding that, in some respects, it stood quite hors ligne; being destitute of a love motive, and having only one ballet, itself proper to the action of the piece. Marie Antoinette was present, and led the applause. As a matter of course, the Piccinnists were furious, not only because of Gluck's good fortune, but on account of the treatment their master had received. Thus war broke out more furiously than ever, the first shot being fired from Piccinni's side in the form of a pamphlet, Entretiens sur l'état actuel de l'Opéra en Paris, written by an architect named Coqueau. It would be of little use closely to follow here the ups and downs of the strife; enough that both the masters held aloof from active participation in a squabble which they assuredly regretted.

We are tempted, however, to take note of one of the charges bandied to and fro by hot-headed partisans, because it deals with a matter always interesting. It was said against Gluck by Coqueau that the air "Amour, viens rendre a mon âme," the French version of "Orphée," had been stolen from the Italian composer, Bertoni. It will be remembered that on a former occasion the master had encountered and refuted a similar accusation. Gluck's friends met the charge with spirit by challenging Coqueau, through the Journal de Paris, to produce Bertoni's air and also the date of his score. In reply, the accuser had the air engraved and scattered over Paris, accompanied by the following commen-

"I. The air 'So'che dal ciel' has for ten years been in the hands of amateurs of the capital, and I have seen several Italian copies; that is to say, copies written in Italy. It has been sung at several concerts, public and private, both before and after the production of 'Orphée,' under the eyes of M. Gluck, and always in the name of Bertoni. On these occasions Gluck made no protest against plagiarism. 2. The air is not in the scores of the Italian 'Orfeo,' engraved in London, Vienna, and elsewhere, while during the first representations of 'Orphée' in France there was a public rumour to the effect that the air had been composed by M. Gluck in Paris for M. Gros.'

The Journal de Paris promptly gave currency to an anonymous reply. Here it is:

"It requires so little talent, some say, and so little merit to write airs like that which ends the first act of the French 'Orphée' that Chevalier Gluck is news reached him. Gluck's "Iphigénie in Tauride," not tempted to challenge the article in your journal said rumour, is to be produced forthwith. In great which has the temerity to assign it to Bertoni. distress the deceived master hurried to Devisme, However, as the truth ought to be spoken, you should know, Messieurs, that M. le Chevalier Gluck composed that air for the coronation of the Emperor, and that it was sung at Frankfort on that solemn occasion by M. Totzi; that later it was inserted in his opera, 'Aristée,' performed at Parma on the occasion of the Infant's marriage, for which he had been called from Vienna, and that it was sung in Parma by Madame Girelli. Would it not have been curious and amusing, Messieurs, had M. le Chevalier Gluck produced at Parma, as his own, an air by Bertoni already known to all Italy? For the rest, if it is true that this air may be found in a work of Bertoni, let any one examine the score of his 'Orféo' and he will be fully convinced that it is not M. le Chevalier Gluck who has copied Bertoni."

Meanwhile, Coqueau, whose honour and veracity were no less at stake in this quarrel than Gluck's, wrote to Bertoni for corroboration. The Italian musician replied in terms as follows:-

"I am much surprised at the question put to me in your letter, and I have no desire to compromise myself in a musical quarrel which, judging by the warmth you display, may come to be of importance. I beg you to allow me to answer simply that the air 'So' che dal ciel' was composed by me at Turin for the Signora Girelli, I forget in what year; I cannot even say whether I wrote it for my 'Iphigénie en Tauride,' as you assure me; I believe, rather, that it belongs to my 'Tancredi,' but this has nothing to do with the question whether it belongs to me. That it is mine I must and do avow, with all the truth of an honourable man, full of respect for the works of great masters, but full of affection for his own."

Triumphant Coqueau straightway sent Bertoni's letter to the Journal de Paris, with a note declaring that only Gluck's denial of its assertions could destroy its effect. But this attempt to force the master's mouth utterly failed. He remained obstinately silent, and allowed judgment to go by default. In all probability he had no real defence to make, and it is not less likely that the singer, Gros, could have told a story, had he chosen, incriminating himself as the instigator of the petty theft. Gros wanted a bravura air, perhaps, and here was one to hand. Voila tout!

Our master's next opera for the Académie Royale was "Echo et Narcisse," but the engagement did not conclude until after some haggling about the price. Gluck, in fact, put up his terms. He received 12,000 crowns for "Iphigénie en Tauride," and wanted 20,000 for the new work. Eventually he came down to 14,000, and then the bargain was struck. "Echo et Narcisse" proved a disappointment, the house, at the second representation, being half empty, and still more desolate at the third. How the Piccinnists rejoiced to hear this good news! They triumphed, in sneers and mock condolences, all along the line. But, as usual, Marie Antoinette stood Gluck's friend; appointing him music master to the Children of France—an office that would necessarily fix him in proximity to the Court. This, however, could not console the deeply-mortified composer, who, from the height of "Iphigénie en Tauride," had fallen very low. He even fretted so much as to bring on a serious illness. "On Friday last," announced the Journal de Paris, "M. le Chevalier Gluck was attacked by a serious illness, the symptoms of which were so alarming that his friends feared for his life. Although still suffering, he is absolutely out of danger." On recovering, the master quitted Paris for Vienna, where we find him writing as follows (Nov. 30, 1779) to Gersin, who had sent a libretto:-

"I am touched by the honour you have done me in sending the plan of a tragedy which I might set know, Messieurs, that M. le Chevalier Gluck composed that air for the coronation of the Emperor, less you do not know that henceforth I write no more operas, and that it was sung at Frankfort on that solemn operas, and that I have finished my career. My age occasion by M. Totzi; that later it was inserted in his opera, 'Aristée,' performed at Parma on the locasion of the Infant's marriage, for which he had for me to compose another."

Meanwhile, the authorities of the Académic Royale thought to appease Gluck by reviving "Echo et Narcisse," with certain emendations of the poem. It was proposed, moreover, to take the bâlon from Francœur and give it to some one more capable. Francœur naturally appealed to the composer, who replied in the subjoined terms :-

"I am very sorry for the trouble between you and M.le Bailli du Roullet on account of one of my works -it seems I am never to be free from the squabbles of the Paris Opéra, neither when I am near nor far away. The other day I received a French paper, in which it was said that I am opposed to Mdlle. Beaumenil playing the rôle of Echo in the same opera. I am no longer astonished at having so many enemies in Paris when so many lies are invented for me. All this abates whatever desire I may have had to return to Paris, for I hate like death all such annoyances. I beg you to excuse me if I leave those concerned at the Opéra to decide your complaint against M. Bailli, especially as I am not in Paris. If I were master you would have cause to complain of nobody, for I have always thought much of your musical talents, and the constant friendship which you have shown. I hope that justice will be done you, and peace soon re-established."

Gluck's friends mustered in strength at the revival of "Narcisse," and applauded the music demonstratively; but the public would not sympathise. At the second performance the receipts dropped to 2,500 livres; at the third to 1,500, and, of course, the work was soon again withdrawn. This did not tend to bring its composer back to Paris, at the risk of hastening to a crisis his augmenting infirmities, nor did Gluck, we may well believe, find much consolation in the misfortune that happened to Piccinni's "Iphigénie," when, after much squabbling, that work was produced on the Académie stage (Jan. 23, 1781). The Italian composer deserved nothing but pity. In the very crisis of his struggle for supremacy a drunken artist ruined all. Let M. Desnoiresterres

"The curtain rose; the opera began. Piccinni awaits in lively anxiety the entrance of Iphigénie in the first scene. She appears; but what is the matter with her? Her features are changed; her eyes have a haggard expression, her legs are hardly able to sustain her. Is it the presentiment of Orestes misery and the perils he will have to face? Is it Diana which thus agitates her priestess? If it were so the poor composer, pale, alarmed, would not follow, with such marked anxiety, every gesture of the cantatrice. Already he had no doubt of his misfortune - Iphigénie was drunk! Thanks to the priestesses and to one who was badly recompensed for his services, she was kept upright, and managed to get through the act, to the astonishment of the house. On going off she plunged her face in a basin of water, which revived her and brought back her self-possession, but not her harmonious timbre and her pure, enchanting diction. She followed her rôle to the end without making a wrong entry or losing a bar, and without singing false, but with a veiled accent, a look clouded by the vapours of halfdissipated intoxication; a monotony of tone and gesture about which no mistake could be made. In an instant the joke went from box to box: 'This is not Iphigénie in Tauride, but Iphigénie in Champagne.'"

^{*} On this point Bertoni was correct.

Of course, the Gluckists heightened this misadventure to the measure of a catastrophe; being, in their turn, accused by Piccinni's friends of having conspired to bring it about. "Knowing the Bacchanalian weakness of Mdlle. la Guerre, who played the chief role, they invited her to a grand banquet, and made her drink so much wine that the poor lyric Princess became incapacitated." Piccinni went home from the Opéra "with death in his soul." It was all very well for the King to shut up the offending artist in prison -where, by the way, she again drank more wine than was good for her-this could not redeem the past. Nor could Mdlle. la Guerre herself, when liberated and in her right mind, make recompense, though she tried, singing and acting divinely, besides throwing all possible significance into the lines:-

O fatal day! how vainly do I wish That in my life it may not reckon'd be!

It came, however, as a potent balm to Piccinni's wound that, when Gluck's "Iphigénie" was revived, and that of the Italian master played three days after, the first drew 2,740 livres, the second 3,538. Later, it is true, Gluck made up lost headway, his "Iphigénie" fairly remaining mistress of the field. late as May, 1781, the German master cherished his resentment against Paris, and maintained his resolve never to return. On that date he wrote:-

"Do not believe the rumours going about with regard to my proximate return to Paris. Till superior orders compel, I will never go to that city, unless the French agree as to the kind of music they want. That flighty people, after having received me in the most flattering manner, appear to be disgusted with all my operas, which do not now attract the crowd as formerly. And look at the 'Seigneur bénéfaisant' which now engages their attention! They would, it appears, return to their pont-neufs. Well, let them."

formance of Gluck's "Alceste," and was burnt to the ground. Pending its re-erection, the company gave concerts at the Tuileries, where a comical episode in the Gluck-Piccinni struggle took place. An Italian air by Gluck being in the programme, Piccinni's friends retired from the hall, in order, as they magnanimously said, not to interfere with the enjoyment of the opposite party. The Gluckists applauded the air furiously, whereupon, to their utter discomfiture, it came out that for Gluck's piece one by Iomelli had been substituted. The laugh went round now on the other side.

When the Opéra re-opened at the little Théâtre des Menus-Plaisirs, "Echo et Narcisse" was revived for a third time, and at last with some success. There was consolation for Gluck in this, but more, perhaps, in the fact that his rivals, even Piccinni himself, to some extent adopted his musical method. A passage in Grimm's Correspondance littéraire has a bearing on this point :-

"The zealots for Gluck, those enemies so unjust and discouraging to the talent of his rival, are the greatest partisans of (Piccinni's) ' Didon,' and pretend that Piccinni has turned Gluckist. . . . We do not disguise the fact that M. Piccinni has worked more at the recitative of this opera, or that he has put into it more purpose, more variety, and, above all, more of the accent of passion and feeling. His airs, always melodious and well constructed, have gained in truth and present an energy of expression of which his detractors did not believe him capable."

As the year 1782 went on rumours spread of Gluck's intended return to Paris. It was even said was some reason for the report, a letter from the August, in which he offered, for 20,000 livres, a new work, "Les Danaïdes," engaging to bring it with him in October. The price was an obstacle at first, but matters were going on swimmingly when the fact came out that another hand than Gluck's had been engaged upon the opera. Forthwith M. le Bailli du Roullet was requested to inform Gluck that the Committee of Direction, having learned that only the first two acts of "Les Danaïdes" were by him, could not count upon the success of the work as though there were no joint authorship. Hence they were justified in offering no more than 10,000 livres for the work, with the understanding that, should its first representations prove successful, they would cheerfully pay the balance. In January, 1783, Gluck replied that, the state of his health preventing him from journeying to Paris, "Les Danaides" would be taken charge of and directed by Salieri, under which circumstances he would lower his price to 12,000 livres. Naturally the Committee at once divined that Salieri had aided Gluck in the composition. They answered that respect for Gluck alone had induced them to derange their programme and announce "Les Danaïdes," that the same motive could not apply to Salieri, and therefore that they would not undertake to bring out the work until, following the usual course, it had been examined and approved. This would have ended the transaction with a less persevering man than the German Orpheus, who proceeded to assail the Committee at a very weak point - that is to say, he obtained the French Ambassador's influence and active interference. The Count de Mercy-Argenteau even went so far as to assert that not only were the first two acts from Gluck's pen, but that the master had dictated the remainder to Salieri, adding an assurance from the Emperor of his Imperial consent to Gluck's absence from Vienna for the requisite rehearsals. Upon this the Committee gave in, and Easter, 1783 was appointed for the production of the new opera. During the rehearsals of "Les Danaïdes," the judgment of connoisseurs was much divided; but the composer's friends stifled such fears as they felt, and resolved to applaud everything. The first performance was not wanting in untoward events. The Revolution was already casting its shadow before, and Gluck's constant friend, Marie Antoinette, once the Parisian idol, had a comparatively cold reception on entering her box, all the en-thusiasm of the assembly being reserved for De Suffren, who had gained some advantages over the English in India. Nevertheless, "Les Danaïdes," despite some very unusual horrors, achieved a great success. The public, we are told, were drunk with it. Now came a grand surprise. Writing from Vienna to M. le Bailli du Roullet, who forwarded the letter to the Journal de Paris, Gluck said: "I beg you, my friend, to have printed in the Journal de Paris the declaration which I ought to make and do now make -that the music of "Les Danaïdes" is entirely by Salieri, and that I have done no more than give the advice he was willing to accept." Was this letter a forgery? We shall presently see.

A NEW CONCERT HALL FOR LONDON.

It will be remembered that a few months ago a discussion arose concerning the paucity of orchestral concerts in London, and utterance was given to a general desire for an increase in their number. This led to expressions of opinion from those well qualified that he would bring with him a new opera. There to judge that, under existing conditions, orchestral concerts could scarcely be made remunerative. In master being received at the Opera about the end of other words, that the limited accommodation in St. James's Hall made high prices absolutely necessary, and that, consequently, a large proportion of the general public was practically excluded from such entertainments of the kind as are actually given. From this it naturally appeared that the desideratum is a new concert room, large enough, in technical terms, to "hold the money." We pointed out that it is little short of a disgrace that Manchester, Liverpool, Birmingham, Leeds, and Sheffield should be better off in this respect than the metropolis. True, we have the Albert Hall, but it would take a great deal of argument to prove that South Kensington is centrally situated, and musicians are unanimous on the point that, however admirable the huge rotunda may be for oratorio on a large scale, it is by no means suitable for orchestral performances. What is needed is a commodious building in a convenient district, and capable of accommodating, say from 4,000 to 5,000 people. Is there any chance of such a building being provided? And, supposing it to be provided, what likelihood is there of its being in demand for musical and other purposes? The most sanguine may begin to despair of a satisfactory answer to the first question, for several months have elapsed since the discussion on the subject took place, and no one has as yet made any sign of coming forward with a practical scheme. There were some who actually dared to suggest that art lovers, with money in their pockets, might provide the people with what is needed out of sheer beneficence. These optimistic folk can scarcely have sufficiently studied our national methods of action in such matters. It is perfectly true that two or three of the great landed proprietors in London, who have so enormously benefited by the rise in the value of house property, could erect a temple of art without in the least degree feeling the sacrifice of money such a work would entail. It is equally true that a dozen or more of our merchant princes could carry out the scheme with equal grace and facility. But to expect that anything of the sort will ever be done by the wealthy classes merely for the sake of art is as unreasonable and preposterous as it is for a child to cry for the moon. If it were a question of endowing a race meeting, or the provision of a site for the slaughter of pigeons, the money would be forthcoming at once. But music is not "sport," and with those who wield the power that money gives, "sport" is the most important affair of life, next to the business of money-getting itself.

It is therefore necessary to approach the subject strictly from the commercial standpoint, and this brings us to the consideration of the second question. If a new concert hall is to be built it must be by private enterprise or by a public company; in either case with the expectation of deriving monetary benefit from the undertaking. Let it be presumed that a site has been secured on the space created by some of the metropolitan street improvements now in progress. This is not an extravagant hypothesis, because the Board of Works has favoured the erection of a new music hall contiguous to the spot now occupied by the establishment known as the Pavilion; and we will do our urban authorities the justice to assume that they care as much, though it may be not more, for music as for more than the property of the particular to the spot flow in the spot flow in the particular to the spot flow in the spot flow in the particular to the spot flow in the spot Supposing our new concert room music halls. to be in existence, it would need to be occupied frequently in order to render it a remunerative speculation. It is known that at first St. James's Hall was a dismal failure, and at one time the advisability of placing the Company in liquidation was seriously discussed. Further than this, it is an won honours. These good wishes will be heartily interesting fact in the history of music that the endorsed by Dr. Chrysander's many friends in Popular Concerts were first started in order to keep England.

the building in occupation, and the result has been the establishment of perhaps the most valuable musical enterprise in the world. It is a well known law of political economy that supply sometimes creates demand, and this has been the case with St. James's Hall. At first it was vain for the directors to pipe, for no one seemed inclined to dance. All is changed now. Since 1880 the shareholders have received dividends varying from seven to ten per cent. The significance of this fact will be esteemed by capitalists who at present cannot see their way to realise more than three or four per cent. with safety. But it may be objected that although St. James's Hall is now in constant use, a new building of twice the size might prove a white elephant for a time to those who contributed to the cost of erecting it. We do not wish to be over-sanguine in the matter. It is quite possible that at first the shareholders would receive no dividends-in other words, that they would be in a position similar to those who purchase deferred annuities. But the period of waiting would certainly be less than in the case of St. James's Hall, if we do not misunderstand the changing conditions not only of musical but of social life now in progress. Let us glance for a moment at the probabilities, leaving mere possibilities out of account. It is extremely probable, for instance, that the Sacred Harmonic Society would shift its quarters and enlarge itself to its former dimensions. If it did not, another Society would very quickly be formed to occupy the ground, and permit the public to hear once more the "choral thunder" of Exeter Hall. Then the difficulty concerning orchestral Concerts could be at once solved, and entertainments of this class established either on Saturday afternoons or evenings. The great question of music for the people could also be approached in a practical way. Performances of various kinds could be given on an adequate scale, and at prices within the reach of all. The wonderful success of the Birmingham Musical Association, under whose auspices Concerts are given weekly, at the Town Hall, and attended by nearly 3,000 working people, shows the nature of the work required. Of course the room would possess a large organ, on which recitals could be given at nominal prices, as is done at Bow, Leeds, Liverpool, and other places. Leaving musical performances, there can be no doubt whatever that the hall would be in great request for political and social meetings, popular demonstrations, and the like. Another point would have to be considered, and that is the advisability of attaching a restaurant to the edifice. We would much rather do without it; but if a restaurant would be essential to success, well, of course, it must be endured. In conclusion, let us explain that in advocating the erection of a new concert hall we have no desire to injure vested interest. Existing buildings are admirable in their way, but the misfortune is that they are insufficient for the requirements of the public. That is the case we have desired to establish, and action should be taken without further

On the 23rd of February, the Emperor of Germany conferred a pension of £150 per annum on Dr. Chrysander, in recognition of his long continued and able labour in editing and publishing the works of Handel. On the same day Prince Bismarck tele-graphed to Dr. Chrysander congratulating him, and expressing a hope that he might successfully complete his onerous task, and long be spared to enjoy his well-

Amongst the many reforms now strenuously advocated in the notation of printed music none, we think, are more worthy of serious attention than that of the abolition of all abbreviations, which, however useful for composers in writing down their ideas as rapidly as possible, should never appear in published works. An explanation of the meaning of much of this musical shorthand is to be found in most books on the elements of the art, three pages in a treatise now before us being entirely devoted to this subject. It need scarcely be said that even to those students who have learnt the value of notes, and the method of placing them in the bar, in all times, these hieroglyphics are extremely perplexing; for, apart from the absurdity, for example, of having three methods of denoting one form of arpeggio, there are some signs upon the meaning of which musicians themselves disagree; and assuredly the word Brillenbässe, used to define certain arpeggio basses, so termed from the likeness of the character to a pair of spectacles, seems a somewhat childish one to be admitted into a musical vocabulary. The tendency to get rid of a number of the now unmeaning signs which have lingered to the present day may be proved by the fact of compositions being published with the passages in which the appoggiatura occurs being printed precisely as they are to be played; and no doubt even the acciaccatura—often mistaken for the appoggiatura, from not having a line drawn through it-will eventually appear as a large, instead of a small, note. It is quite refreshing to see the word "obsolete" after such signs as the Nachschlag, the Chute, the Port de voix, the Backfall, the Double Backfall, and many others; but we look forward to the time when composers, instead of indicating, will write what they mean, and then it will be thought as ridiculous to manner in which they are to be performed.

THAT in Africa the performance of a little drama, very much in character like a Greek play, and acted entirely by children, should be organised to "please the white man" seems indeed strange; but we are assured by a young missionary on the banks of the Congo river that such an event actually took place recently at Equatorville. It consisted in the first place of some clever dancing, and then of a little bit of operatic acting, the choruses being rendered by little girls of from eight to twelve years of age. "A strange looking bier," writes our informant, "was carried in on the shoulders of four men, upon which was something or somebody covered over with red baize cloth." This bier, we are told, was placed upon the ground, a pretty little girl sitting by its side. A plaintive song was then chanted by a woman, which was afterwards sung in chorus by the girls. The music of this, it is said, was "sweet and sad," but few of the words could be understood save the oft repeated "Ka-wa-ka"—he is not dead. When the incantation was considered to have worked, there was a noticeable heaving and shuddering in the covered mass on the bier; the red cloth was drawn aside, and a girl was discovered, "her chest heaving quickly and her limbs trembling." Two persons then took her by the arms and raised her to her feet. This ended the play, the simple pathos of which evidently touched not only the "white man" for whom it was especially designed, but the natives, who could better understand and appreciate the merits of the libretto. The choruses were sung by the juvenile vocalists with true pathetic feeling; and, from what we can gather from our correspondent, this little "Equatorial Drama" produced a better effect upon the audience given in our midst.

WE are glad to find, by many communications from those who have the matter really at heart; that the desire of rendering justice to some of the finest sacred compositions is gradually leading to a movement for the introduction of orchestras into our churches. A letter from a clergyman, recently received, says that he finds it quite possible to organise a small orchestra, with the help of a few professionals, who always kindly give their services, even in a village; and should this example be imitated in our large towns, how many of those works universally admitted as most powerful aids to devotion might then take their place in the service of the Church? When Canon Farrar preached his excellent sermon on music in Westminster Abbey some few years ago, this is what he said, after declaring that "the whole Bible thrills with song," and enforcing his assertion by quotations: "So it is with the one great Book of God; and so it is also with Nature, which is another Book of God. There is indeed little of what can accurately be called music in Nature; for music is the divine prerogative of human and angelic beings; and Nature furnishes only the rude elements of itthe uncut diamonds (as it were) of sound. We may indeed say that the winds of God make music under the blue dome of His Temple not made with handsmusic, sweet sometimes, and soft as the waving of angel-wings; or weird, as when it sweeps the wild moors, and mingles her multitudinous murmurs of the withered heather-bells; or awful, as when it roars among the mountain pines." That the highest use of this "divine prerogative" is in the cause of religion can scarcely be doubted; but without the combination of voices and instruments its true power can be but faintly realised; and all who agitate, therefore, for the formation of small orchestras for dispute about what notes are intended as about the the service of the Church are really endeavouring to strengthen the eloquence of sacred music.

SIR GEORGE MACFARREN, who occupied the chair at a lecture delivered in London by Mr. Brinley Richards a short time ago, said that "the present is an age devoted to the destruction of popular belief." Certainly it may be termed an age when creeds of any kind are placed upon their trial; and it is much to the credit of Mr. Richards that he has devoted so large a portion of his life to sifting the evidence upon which rested the assertion that musical notation in Wales existed at a time when it was unknown in all the other countries of the world. For some years he has been lecturing to dispel this delusion; and of course, being a Welshman, has raised much angry feeling against himself in the land of his birth. Mr. Richards, however, is not a man to flinch from his self-imposed task when he feels that he has right on his side. , It is easy enough to earn the title of patriot by extolling the strong points, and passing over the weak ones of your countrymen; but there are some who are more content with the good opinion of the educated few than with the applause of the uneducated many; and having convinced himself by diligent research of the truth of his theory, we are glad to find that Mr. Richards has the courage to promulgate it. He tells us that "the ancient and authentic chronicle of Caradoc, in the eleventh century, was, for some purpose, altered by the translators, who have actually interpolated passages without a single hint to guard their readers against error." This may be an unpleasant fact for those who have maintained the exceptional powers of the Cymri against all who ventured to doubt them; but "facts are stubborn things"; and he is the best friend of a nation who than many of more pretensions which have been accepts notits history without patient and unprejudiced examination.

At the time of going to press the illness from which Sir Julius Benedict has been suffering shows no signs of alleviation. The symptoms of bronchitis, complicated with angina pectoris, are severe, and the patient is restless and gradually weakening. His wonderful constitution may, however, make a rally, and delay the end for some time. To his heavy affliction and the distress of his family none of our readers, we feel sure, will deny their warmest sympathy.

GOUNDD'S new Paschal Mass was performed for the first time on the 14th ult., at the Eglise de Saint Bustache. M. Goundo himself conducted, and the choir, gathered from the other Paris churches, numbered 300 vocalists. Success was not a moment in doubt. Devoid of theatrical effects, and evidently founded on the classic model of Palestrina, the numbers were at times almost austere in character, the most prominent features being the "Gloria in Excelsis" and the "Agnus Dei." The French papers are unanimous in praising the latest outcome of M. Gounod's religious feeling.

"THE ROSE OF SHARON" was performed at Newcastle by Mr. Rea's choir on the 24th ultimo, with such success as to be styled "the greatest musical achievement ever witnessed in the city." Great part of this triumph may undoubtedly be ascribed to the fact that Mr. Mackenzie conducted in person, and that the principals were such trustworthy artists as Mrs. Hutchinson, Miss Hope Glenn, Mr. Henry Piercy, and Mr. Watkin Mills. The critic of the Newcastle Daily Journal, subscribing to the opinion that "The Rose of Sharon" is the greatest oratorio written since "Elijah," adds his conviction that "Mr. Mackenzie is destined to take a position in the musical world never yet attained by any Englishman." Another local critic, not less enthusiastic, takes the opportunity of expressing a hope that the gifted musician will make a second attempt at operatic writing. Both Mr. Mackenzie and his work have met, in Newcastle, with a reception worthy of their deserts.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL CHORAL SOCIETY.

THE only performance we have to note of this Society is that of "The Redemption" on the 11th ult. Gounod's sacred trilogy has now taken a firm position in the répertoire, and whenever it is given we may look for an effective rendering and a large audience. In both these respects there was ample cause for satisfaction on the present occasion. The choral numbers offer no difficulty to Mr. Barnby's efficient forces, and they were given with unfailing correctness and all needful expression. Madame Valleria, sang the soprano music for the first time, and acquitted herself like the true artist she is. It is only necessary to say that Madame Patey and Mr. Santley sang the principal contralto and bass music to signify that these portions of the work received the fullest justice. A word of commendation must be given to Miss Bertha Moore and Mr. Watkin Mills for their services in the subordinate parts. The audience suffered a diappointment owing to the illness of Mr. Lloyd, but Mr. Henry Piercy, a vocalist with a light and agreeable tenor voice, proved a capable

A correspondent writes to correct our statement last month that there had been eight rehearsals of "The Rose of Sharon," the number having been only five. This being the case, no blame can accrue to the members of the chair for failing to render justice to the work or to their own reputation. It, however, only seems to heighten the feelings of irritation caused by this unfortunate business.

"THE ROSE OF SHARON."

In view of the fact that, through various causes, the performances of Mr. Mackenzie's' Oratorio in Central London and the West had not given full satisfaction, it was resolved to make a special presentation of the work under circumstances qualified to guarantee the necessary executive merit. For this purpose engagements were made with Madame Albani—who had never sung the music of The Sulamite—with Madame Patey, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley. Moreover, a fine orchestra, having Mr. Carrodus as leader, was secured, contingents of admirable choristers were obtained from the various London societies which had studied the work, and Mr. Mackenzie himself was brought over from Florence to conduct. We should add that Mr. Eaton Faning ably presided at the choral rehearsals, of which in all there were eight. So prepared, the performance could only be regarded as an assured success, and such it proved in the full sense of the term.

The hold of "The Rose of Sharon" upon the public was amply demonstrated by the crowded state of St. James's Hall, on Friday, the 20th ult. Every seat had an occupant, and persons were necessarily refused admission for want of room. An effect such as this, like effects in general, must have an adequate cause, and we see in it another proof that positive merit, whether in a Briton or a foreigner, commands honour and reward in terms not to be gainsaid. Mr. Mackenzie obtained a flattering reception on taking the Conductor's place. He is by this time firmly seated in public favour, and if public gratitude means "a keen sense of favours to come," we can only say that there is good reason for it. Humanly speaking, the Scottish composer has the future in his own hands. Regarding the general performance we can use warm words of praise. Setting aside one or two trifling defects of a kind impossible always to insure against, the work was rendered admirably. There were merits, indeed, not approached on any previous occasion, and here we refer above all to the service done by Madame Albani. That lady had made not only the music but the character her own. She had studied the latter dramatically, till its very spirit became hers, and then, calling upon a large stage experience for help, she embodied The Sulamite with all the vividness that a Concert platform allows. This was most obvious in the dream scene, where she presented an example of refined and subtle art, most suggestive of realism without being unduly realistic. Her singing was throughout admirable in spirit and execution; the air "The Lord is my Shepherd" bringing to a focus merits upon which it is a pleasure to reflect. Madame Albani gained, as she deserved, the hearty and unanimous applause of her audience. Regarding Madame Patey, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley, we need not again speak at length-they repeated a familiar success; Mr. Lloyd especially carrying off honours by his delightful singing in the part of The Beloved. All praise was deserved by chorus and orchestra-by the former for its excellence of tone, precision, and expression; by the latter for correctness, scarcely marred by a flaw. Mr. Mackenzie conducted admirably, and a word is due to the help rendered by Mr. Musgrove Tufnail in the concerted solo music and the solo of the Officer of the Court. The Oratorio was again heard to its end with unflagging interest, and applauded as that only is which appeals through the voice of genius.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

THE Handel bi-centenary celebration of this Society consisted of a revival of the master's undeservedly neglected Oratorio "Belshazzar," on February 27. A better choice could not have been made, and it may be hoped that public attention having been once more directed to this very fine work it will appear frequently in the programmes of this and kindred Societies. Caprice alone can be assigned as the cause for the neglect of "Belshazzar." True, the Oratorio does not contain any one number which has attained popularity apart from the context, but, taken as a whole, it is as varied and picturesque as the best of the companion works. Handel evidently regarded it as one of his best efforts. He seems to have been much pleased with the libretto furnished by Charles Jennens, though he recognised its intolerable verbosity and exercised a wise discretion in rejecting some portions of the wordy dialogues. Even as it stands the Oratorio is far too long for modern audiences, and one cannot refrain from wondering at the enormous musical digestive powers of our ancestors, who it seems not only sat out a four hours Oratorio, but accepted several Concertos between the parts. "Belshazzar" was first performed on March 27, 1745, at the King's Theatre in the Haymarket, and was twice repeated. The Sacred Harmonic Society revived it in 1847, and the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society in 1873. It is a noteworthy fact that the work was never printed as it was finally left by Handel until the German Handel Society's edition appeared in 1864. The composer set several portions of the libretto twice, and made other revisions which will account for the discrepancies in the earlier editions of Randall, Arnold, and the English Handel Society. The vocal score published in 1873 by Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co., under the editorship of Professor Macfarren, accords in every respect with the latest intentions of the composer so far as they can be ascertained.

Turning from the historical to the critical examination of the work, it must be observed in the first place that Handel exhibits himself in his fullest vigour in the choruses of "Belshazzar," though for the most part they are written in four-part harmony, and therefore should not compare with the choral numbers of "Deborah," Israel in Egypt," and "Solomon." In several instances, however, they are marked by immense breadth and grandeur of style. Such are "All empires upon God," "Sing, O ye heavens," and "By slow degrees," while in "Behold, by Persia's hero made," "See from his post," and above all in the chorus of Babylonian revellers, "Ye tutelar gods," Handel displays his feeling for dramatic effect in unstinted measure. In no other work from the same hand do we find more unflagging energy and variety in the choral numbers. If the solos are not as a whole so striking to modern ears, it is because in form and phraseology they are mostly old-fashioned. But here again we note remarkable vigour of utterance, and considerable regard for contrast and characterisation. Compare the airs of Cyrus, especially "Great God who yet," with Belshazzar's florid and bacchanalian strains, "Let festal joy" and "Let the deep bowl," and we perceive the composer's skill in the art of tone painting. In brief, "Belshazzar" must be reckoned among the masterpieces of oratorio, and it is inconceivable that it should again be permitted to sink into obscurity and forgetfulness.

The most meritorious feature in the performance was the almost perfect rendering of the choruses. Thanks to the training of Mr. W. H. Cummings, the choir had not only mastered the music, but were enabled to pay attention to the matters of accent, phrasing of the florid passages, and proper enunciation of the words. The breakdown that occurred in the episode where the handwriting appears on the wall, was due to a misunderstanding of Mr. Halle's intentions. Such accidents will continue to occur while one Conductor prepares the works and another takes his place at the last moment. For the most part the solos received ample justice. Madame Patey and Mr. Lloyd, in the parts of Cyrus and Belshazzar respectively, once more proved their pre-eminence as oratorio singers, and it is impossible to imagine a finer rendering of their share of the music. Miss Annie Marriott, as Nitocris, and Mr. Bridson, as Gobrias, did the comparatively little that was required of them satisfactorily, and an exceedingly favourable impression was made by Miss Chester, a mezzo-soprano of much promise, as Daniel, a part sometimes taken by a bass. The additional accompaniments of Mr. Edward Hecht, and the organ part of Sir George Macfarren, of course open the door of controversy. We shall not enter into the matter here, but must express surprise at the continued unwillingness of Conductors to employ a pianoforte for the accompaniment of the recitatives and airs in Handelian oratorio. The composer's intentions in this matter are clearly expressed, and there would be no difficulty whatever in carrying them out. "Belshazzar" was very warmly received, the audience being probably surprised as well as delighted at the beauty and general effectiveness of the work.

THE BACH CHOIR.

IT naturally devolved upon this Association to mark the bi-centenary Festival of John Sebastian Bach in some special manner, and it may be said that the obligation was discharged in a way that was highly creditable to all concerned. It will be remembered that the Bach Choir was formed about nine years ago as a temporary body, for the purpose of reviving the master's "Hohe Messe, and the interest excited by the performances of this extraordinary work led its executants to remain together as a permanent Choral Society. No more suitable offering therefore could be placed on the shrine of Bach on his 200th birthday than a rendering of the Mass, with all the additional effect that could be imparted by a liberal expenditure of time, labour, and money. A guarantee fund was formed, the offerings to which were so large as to prove the existence of a widespread interest in the great com-poser. Meanwhile the choir and its conductor, Mr. Otto Goldschmidt, went to work with a will. A large extra body of voices was secured; a considerable proportion of which consisted of paid, professional singers, an immense number of choral and orchestral rehearsals were held, and actually some of the obsolete instruments in the score were re-manufactured, including the oboi d'amore and the peculiar high-pitched trumpet, for which a player was fetched from Berlin. After all this zeal and pains, it is not surprising that the performance at the Albert Hall, on the 21st ult., was in most respects unsurpassable. Certainly the work had never before been interpreted in such a fashion, and the event is therefore an honour to music in England. The marvellously intricate and florid choruses, for a long period regarded as all but impossible of proper execution, were given with clockwork precision, and the effect of some of them, notably the "Cum Sancto Spiritu," the "Et vitam venturi," and the "Sanctus," was overpoweringly grand. It was not the fault of the principal vocalists that their share of the work was less impressive. Miss Anna Williams, Madame Patey, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. T. Kempton (who appeared at short notice as a substitute for Signor Foli) sang conscientiously and well, but the airs are written in a fashion that has passed away, and consequently only possess antiquarian interest. Herein lies one of the reasons for the limited popularity of Bach as compared with that of Handel. The latter studied the capabilities of the vocal organ, and, interpreted by skilled singers, his airs have still power to charm. The old Leipzig Cantor, on the other hand, was seldom content to drop his science, and hence the solos in the Mass are mostly polyphonic pieces in which the voice merely takes one of the "real parts." The most noteworthy exception is the pathetic "Agnus Dei," which proves what a master of expression, Bach could be when he chose. It was a pity that after so much trouble had been taken to realise the composer's intentions the score was not rigidly adhered to in every particular. The use of the trumpets in the Credo, and the doubling of certain instruments, were errors of judgment which on such an occasion it is impossible to overlook. Still they did not greatly detract from the merit of a performance which in its way has never been equalled, and for which the thanks of musicians are due to all who took any active part in it.

BOW AND BROMLEY INSTITUTE.

Musically, the East of London is not so barrenin genuine art work as some might suppose. Concerts are sometimes given at Shoreditch and at Bow which put to shame more pretentious efforts in wealthier parts of the metropolis. A conspicuous example was afforded on the roth ult., when the Bow and Bromley Institute Choir, under Mr. W. G. McNaught, performed "The Rose of Sharon." The shortcomings of those who were responsible for previous renderings of Mr. Mackenzie's oratorio in London have received their due award of blame, and we have no desire to re-open an unpleasant subject; but it is only fair to say that it was reserved for a Tonic Sol-fa Choir to give the first satisfactory interpretation of the work. Mr. McNaught's forces had been well drilled, and a remarkable feature of their singing was the unfailing steadiness in the attack, together with smoothness in the ensemble.

All the nuances were well observed, and the voices were well balanced. Though the exigencies of space did not permit of the employment of a large orchestra, the players made up in quality what they lacked in numbers, and the slips were few and comparatively unimportant. Mrs. Hutchinson sang the music of the title rôle with quiet taste and expression, and, except for an unfortunate mistake in the air "The Lord is my Shepherd," she left little to desire. Miss Hilda Wilson repeated her now familiar success in the contralto airs, and Mr. Watkin Mills was highly acceptable in the bass music. Mr. Lloyd was as artistic as ever, though an apology was made for him on the ground of hoarseness. The hall was crowded, and the audience was very liberal in its applause.

LONDON MUSICAL SOCIETY.

A PROGRAMME of exceptional interest to musicians was performed on the 25th ult., at St. James's Hall, by this Society. The items were but three in number, but all of them were given for the first time in England. The first was a selection of three numbers of Dvorák's orchestral "Legenden," a series of ten pieces, Op. 59. They are full of the Bohemian composer's individuality, and strongly national in colour. Unfortunately the rendering was tame and quite devoid of the life and character they evidently need. Consequently the effect was not so great as could be wished. The next work was Schumann's Cantata, "Der Sängers Fluch," a companion to "Der Königssohn," produced last year, the poem being by the same author, Ludwig Uhland. These works were written near the Ludwig Uhland. tragic close of Schumann's career, when clouds had already commenced to obscure the sun of his genius. Further, his intensely subjective nature could not lend itself completely to the illustration of any given subject, itself completely to the illustration of any geometric and, consequently, although a great deal of "The "Minstrel's Curse" is charming as abstract music, the absence of dramatic vigour cannot fail to be felt. music flows on pleasantly enough, but one fails to realise the scene pictured by the poet. For concert purposes the third work, Rheinberger's legend "Ohristoforus," is far more effective. It was given at the Düsseldorf Festival last year, and was received with much favour. The beautiful story of St. Christopher has been well treated by the librettist, F. von Hoffnaass, and Rheinberger's music is remarkably graphic and spirited. In a scene where the Saint is tempted by seductive spells there is a suggestion of Wagner, and in a chorus descriptive of the havoc caused by Satan's legions, we are reminded of Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Night." But, speaking generally, the music is as fresh as it is melodious and picturesque, and "Christoforus" should certainly become popular with choral societies. It cannot be said that the performance of either cantata was altogether satisfactory. Some of the soloists, whose names need not be mentioned, left much to desire, but Miss C. Elliot and Mr. Thorndike were commendable, and Mr. H. Piercy sang with much taste and feeling. Mr. Barnby had worked up the choir to a condition of efficiency, and the choruses in Rheinberger's work were extremely well sung; but the orchestral playing throughout the evening was very rough, and once there was an absolute breakdown, necessitating a stoppage and a recommencement of the movement. An incident of this kind is scarcely creditable in a performance by a high-class Society.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

THE Saturday Concert of February 28 was principally devoted to the works of J. S. Bach. A very excellent selection was made, commencing with the overture from the Suite in C, for strings, oboes, and bassoons. This overture consists of a stately introduction, and a clear and masterly fugue with frequent episodes for wind instruments The overture was followed by the familiar Chaconne from the sonatas for violin without accompaniment - a series of pieces absolutely unique, of which it is to be regretted that the few violinists who are able to grapple with them select for performance only a few of the more popular movements. The fugue in G minor, the Bourrée in B minor, and the chaconne are tolerably often played; the sixth sonata; but there are many other movements quite equal in merit to these, which are scarcely ever form, played the Chaconne, as probably he alone can play it. His performance was perfect alike in its breadth of style, clearness of accent, and perfect mastery of the enormous technical difficulties of the work. The Toccata and Fugue in D minor for organ, which came next in the programme, was excellently played by Mr. Eyre, the organist of the Crystal Palace. The work itself is familiar to all organists as an excellent specimen of Bach's The concerto in D minor for two violins, accomstyle. panied by an orchestra of strings, has been more than once given at the Monday Popular Concerts. On this occasion the solo parts were played by Herren Joachim and Heckmann, the latter proving himself a worthy comrade of the former. The performance was noteworthy for the unity of style and phrasing of the two soloists. The selection from Bach's works concluded with several extracts from the great Church Cantata "Ein feste Burg," which is founded on Luther's well-known choral. In this work the choruses were extremely well sung by the Crystal Palace choir, who have seldom been heard to greater advantage. It was, however, a mistake to allot the air "Within my heart of hearts" to Mr. Harper Kearton, because in Bach's score it is written for a soprano voice. With this reservation, we have only praise for the performance. Mendelssohn's violin concerto, splendidly rendered by Herr Joachim, and Brahms's "Academic Overture" completed the programme of the concerts.

One of the finest performances in our recollection of Schumann's Symphony in D Minor was the special feature at the concert of the 7th ult. On the same afternoon Mr. T. Wingham's Concert-Overture in A, No. 5, originally composed for Mr. Kuhe's Brighton Festival of 1879, was heard for the first time at the Crystal Palace. The overture shows the graceful invention and sound workmanship which we are accustomed to associate with the name of Mr. Wingham; the performance left nothing to desire. A new pianist, Madame Agnes Miller, made her first appearance at these concerts with Beethoven's concerto in C minor, of which she gave a neat and intelligent, if not very striking rendering. The remainder of the programme calls for no detailed notice.

The Concert of the 14th ult. opened with Mendelssohn's Overture in C, Op. 24, originally composed for a military band, and scored for full orchestra by Mr. Manns. Objections have been raised in some quarters to arrangements of this kind; our own view is that every case must be judged upon its own merits. If the fact of the arrangement is clearly announced, as in the present instance, no injury is done to the composer; and when the adaptation is so musicianly and so effective, as is the case with Mr. Manns's score, we see no reason whatever for its not being made. Mr. Manns was probably not aware that the overture had been already arranged by M. C. Eberwein, and appears to have been published in Mendelssohn's lifetime. Herr Robert Hausmann, a violoncello player of high attainments, who has been heard at the Crystal Palace in previous years, played an Andante and Allegro by Davidoff. presumably two movements from a concerto, well written for the solo instrument, but of no great intrinsic musical value. The programme also included the introduction and final scene from "Tristan und Isolde," the solo part being sung by Miss Anna Williams, Beethoven's Symphony in B flat, of which a very fine performance was given, and Dvorák's "Scherzo Capriccioso" for orchestra, first produced at the Crystal Palace last season, when it was conducted by the composer. It is unquestionably one of his most genial works, and well deserved a second hearing.

The programme of the sixteenth Concert, on the 21st ult., had somewhat the aspect of a musical tour; on a small scale, it is true, but extending through three centuries-viz., from the birth of Giovanni Gabrieli, in 1557, to Wagner's death, in 1883. Italy was represented by a Sonata for double orchestra, or to give it its full title, "Sonata Pian e Forte, alla quarto Bassa," by the said Giovanni Gabrieli. The contemporary of Palestrina, this early representative of the Venetian School studied under his uncle, Andrea in B minor, and the chaconne are tolerably often played; Gabrieli, a still more prolific composer of vocal music than and one occasionally hears the Gavotte and Rondo from himself, and succeeded to the post of organist at St.

predilection for the gigantic, and even at that early date to have anticipated this great French master, by composing double and triple choruses in sixteen parts, to be performed at a distance from each other (Cori spezzati), a mode of procedure to which he was doubtless led by the fact that St. Mark's possessed two large organs, with space before each for a separate choir. Among his works are to be found "Madrigali" and "Sacræ Symphoniæ" (in 6-16 parts), for voices or instruments. It was probably one of these works that was presented on the present occasion; for it had all the semblance of a motett for two choirs, played by instruments-viz. (first orchestra), cornetto and three trombones; (second orchestra), viola, violoncello, and three trombones. Its effect was quaint, but by no means unpleasing, though one heard but very little of the England was somewhat meagrely represented by Pur-cell's song from "The Libertine," "Nymphs and shepherds, come away," gracefully sung by Mrs. Hutchinson.

France, no less so, by the well known Rigadoon from Rameau's "Dardanus." Of this the analyst [G.] remarked: " It has, unfortunately, been re-scored by Gevaert." Why "unfortunately" we are at a loss to say, for, apparently, the "re-scoring" amounts to no more than "editing" a new edition.

The remainder of the programme was devoted to Germany, unless Handel is to be accounted as belonging to England. First came the most popular of Bach's Orchestral Suites—viz., one of three in D; then a couple of Airs from Handel's "Ode to St. Cecilia's Day," "But oh! what Art can teach," and "Orpheus could lead," both sung by Mrs. Hutchinson, and the organ part to the former supplied by Mr. A. J. Eyre. Haydn was exemplified by a couple of movements from an early Symphony "Le Midi," performed, as was stated, for the first time in England; Mozart, by the Aria "In diesen heil'gen Hallen" (" Zauberflöte"), sung in Italian by Mr. Watkin Mills, and Beethoven by the ever welcome Allegretto Scherzando and Finale from his eighth Symphony. The Wagnerian selection, which completed the scheme, included "Wotan's Abschied von Brünnhilde und Feuerzauber" and "Der Ritt der Walküren" ("Die Walküre"). Both in the Aria from "Zauberflöte" and in "Wotan's Abschied" (sung in English) Mr. Watkin Mills gave evidence of the possession of a splendid bass voice as well as of the excellent training he is still undergoing with Herr Blume. Except that there was a lack of breadth in the rendering of "Feuerzauber," and that the little bells (Glockenspiel) which impart such a wonderful colouring to the "flickering flames" were altogether absent, the performance generally was fully up to the high standard to which Mr. Manns has accustomed us.

MONDAY AND SATURDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

In resuming our record of these entertainments we have again to note the absence of any specially interesting features in the programmes. Not a single novelty of importance has been produced; not one new executant of mark has appeared. It may be said that the public has not yet evinced any signs of tiring of familiar works and familiar players. This is true of the Saturdays, but scarcely so of the Mondays, for on several occasions weak programmes have resulted in diminished audiences. We think it right to utter a word of warning, as the history of our leading musical societies proves that long persistence in nothing save routine work leads to disaster at last, and the Popular Concerts are too valuable an institution to be trifled with. Passing to the consideration of what has been done during the past month, we have to commence with the Concert of Saturday, February 28. On this occasion Herr Joachim was absent, and the leadership was resumed by Madame Norman-Néruda, the principal marks being Beshmele Seatest in G. Op. 26. and cipal works being Brahms's Sextet in G, Op. 36, and Beethoven's Sonata in G for piano and violin, Op. 30, No. 3. Signor Piatti's melodious Sonata in C, for piano and violoncello, was repeated, and Madame Haas gave a quietly artistic rendering of Chopin's familiar Scherzo in B flat minor, Op. 31, in which she was encored. Mr. Lloyd sang Signor Piatti's serenade, "Awake, awake,"

Mark's, Venice. Like Berlioz he seems to have had a which the audience probably knew by heart, and two of Dvorák's charming gipsy songs. On Monday, the 2nd ult., a veritable sensation was provided in the appearance of Signor Bottesini, and the audience was the largest of the season. The eminent virtuoso of the double-bass needs no defence for playing his own compositions, as his instrument is entirely without a repertory of solo music. The Andante and Finale he introduced belong to his Concerto in F sharp minor, which he played in its entirety at a Philharmonic Concert last May. Signor Bottesini is a sound musician as well as a phenomenal executant, and this work is not only full of melody in the elegant Italian manner, but is skilfully written, particularly the first movement, which was omitted on this occasion. The performance created a furore, and the audience would not permit the player to retire until he had given another proof of his unequalled ability. Another in-teresting feature of the Concert was a Sonata in A for piano and violin, by Gade, Op. 6. This is of course an early work of the gifted Danish composer, and is not altogether a representative example of his genius. The writing for the piano in the first and last movements is light and florid, almost suggestive of the effects of a musical box, and the middle movement in F, though melodious, is somewhat weak. It is said that Gade's second Sonata for the same instruments is more interesting. The programme commenced with Mozart's favourite Quartet in D minor, No. 2, of which the Minuet was encored, and concluded with Schubert's "Trout" Quintet in A, Op. 114. The pianist was Miss Zimmermann, but for once there was no pianoforte solo, a very rare circumstance at these Concerts. It cannot be said that Herr von Zur-Mühlen was altogether satisfactory in Lieder by Schumann and Jensen. hoven's Kreutzer Sonata, always now reserved for the Saturday Concerts, was performed on the 7th for the fiftythird time. In consequence of the illness of Mr. Zerbini, Mozart's Quintet in C, which headed the programme, could not be given, and the Quartet in C, No. 6, of the Haydn set, was substituted. Miss Zimmermann could not be commended for introducing Liszt's transcription of Bach's Organ Fantasia and Fugue in G minor. Such things are entirely out of place in a classical concert, and those of the audience who persisted in a demand for an encore no doubt desired to hear some genuine pianoforte music. Mr. Maas sang familiar airs by Handel and Mendelssohn. There is even less to be said about the Concert of Monday, the 9th ult. There were two quartets—namely, Haydn's in D, Op. 64, No. 1, and Beethoven's in E flat, Op. 74, both of which have been heard many times. Herr Joachim played Spohr's Scena Cantante, with David's pianoforte accompaniment, and Mr. Max Pauer was heard to advantage in Mendelssohn's Scherzo a Capriccio and his Andante and Presto Agitato. Mr. Santley gave a splendid interpretation of Schumann's Ballade "Belshazzar," a fine and dramatic composition that ought to become popular. Schubert's great Quartet in D minor was the first work in the programme of the following Saturday. This wonderful creation can scarcely be too frequently heard, but there is no apparent reason why the still finer Quartet in G should be wholly put aside. For the first time for many weeks we had a Pianoforte Sonata, namely, Beethoven's in D minor, Op. 31, No. 2, which was carefully rendered by Madame Frickenhaus; Herr Joachim repeated Tartini's Trillo del Diavolo "by desire," and Beethoven's string Trio in G, Op. 9, No. 1, concluded the Concert. Owing to the absence of Mr. Lloyd, through illness, the audience was disappointed of hearing "Adelaide," but Miss Etherington was an acceptable vocalist in his place.

The most important item in the programme of Monday the 16th was Beethoven's Quartet in C sharp minor, Op. 131. This remarkable and very advanced work had been performed a few days previously by the Heckmann Quartet, so that comparisons were invited, perhaps intentionally. Schumann's third Trio in G minor, Op. 110, which concluded the scheme, had only been given once before at these Concerts. It is a fine work, full of the composer's individuality, but on the whole less interesting than his earlier trios, particularly the one in D minor. Miss Zimmermann contented herself with three trifling pieces by Scarlatti, and firmly declined an encore. A fine air from Handel's Opera "Rodelinda" was introduced by Mr. Maas. Very properly the major portion of the programme of the 21st consisted of works by Bach, but before these came a miscellaneous selection, including Mendelssohn's beautiful Quartet in E flat, Op. 44, No. 3, and Marcello's fine violoncello Sonata in F, excellently played by Herr Hausmann. The Bach items commenced with the Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue, of which Mdlle. Kleeberg gave a very clever rendering. Next came the familar air "My heart ever faithful," interpreted by Miss Carlotta Elliot. Herr Joachim played the violin Prelude and Fugue in G minor as he alone can play it, and joined Mdlle. Kleeberg in the clavier and violin Sonata in E, No. It is not a little curious that in the descriptive notices of Bach's works reference is invariably made to Forkel's biography, but never to the more valuable, because more trustworthy, work of Spitta. Thus the reader is referred to a few sentences on the clavier and violin sonatas in the earlier treatise, whereas Spitta gives an elaborate analysis of the whole series. On the 23rd, the last Concert we can notice this month, Brahms's first Sextet in B flat, Op. 18, was the most important work. It was superbly rendered, and the Scherzo was encored. A very charming interpre-tation of two of Schubert's Momens Musicaux was given by Mdlle. Kleeberg. Beethoven's string Trio in C minor, Op. 9, No. 3, and Mozart's melodious Sonata in A for piano and violin, were included in the programme, and Mr. Maas was the vocalist.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

It was a wise resolution on the part of the Directors of this Institution to engage one Conductor for the series of Concerts; and although we might have imagined that a competent artist could have been found from amongst those who honorarily filled this important post last season, the choice of Sir Arthur Sullivan is certainly one which will sufficiently secure public sympathy. But we cannot give such praise to the wisdom of selecting programmes for the whole of the six Concerts in which the name of only one living English composer appears. Mr. T. Wingham, who represents British talent by an Orchestral Serenade, has already made a fame which demands recognition; but so have a few others we could name; and had a commission been, given to some of these, who have sufficiently evidenced the possession of exceptional creative power, it would have been infinitely better than, by the offer of a twenty pounds prize, to drag a composer into judgment who, as the result has proved, is only the best of a number. Those who can remember the time when this same Society placed young Sterndale Bennett in the orchestra to perform his own Pianoforte Concerto before one of the most critical audiences of the day must agree with us that the policy of the Institution has indeed changed when, with an increased and increasing number of accredited English composers, their claims to a hearing should be almost entirely ignored. Let us hope, however, not only for the promotion of English art, but for the good of the Society itself, that better counsels may prevail in the future, and that the sole passport to the acceptance of a composition for performance shall be the worth of the work, and not the foreign name of its author. A new Symphony (expressly written for the Society) by Dvorák, and a Symphonic Poem, "Johanna D'Arc," by Moszkowski (both to be conducted by the composers) will be welcome novelties in the programme of the season; and other works by living foreign composers already known in this country will also be given.

At the first Concert, on February 26, an overwhelming reception was accorded to Sir Arthur Sullivan on his entering the orchestra, the delicate rendering of the purely orchestral compositions—Brahms's Symphony, No. 3, in F, and the Overtures, "Athalie" (Mendelssohn) and "The Ruler of the Spirits" (Weber)—amply evidencing that this warm recognition of his skill as a Conductor was thoroughly deserved. Herr Joachim's performance of Beethoven's Violin Concerto elicited the usual enthusiastic plaudits from the large audience assembled, and Mdlle Elly Warnots in Handel's "Sweet Bird" (with Mr. Svendsen's refined flute obbligato) and "Come per me sereno," from "La Sonnambula," exhibited much executive facility.

The second Concert, on the 12th ult., introduced the "Prize Overture," which was chosen from eighty-eight sent from various parts of the world, and is the composition of Gustav Ernest (a foreigner resident in London), who conducted his work. Not only is this Overture termed "dramatic," but we are told in the annotated programme what it all means; and instead therefore of judging it as abstract music, the audience was evidently intent upon trying to discover whether the portion which represented the "stern forces of primitive nature," and that which expressed the "gentle influence of love, in the most comprehensive acceptation of that word," were sufficiently eloquent for their mission; and also whether, without the printed guide to the composer's intention, the fact of the "stern motive" being "subdued by its gentle companion" at the conclusion was sufficiently made apparent. In truth, this ambitious "programme music," treated by so young and inexperienced a hand, appeals rather to the leniency than to the critical faculty of the listeners; and, with every desire to encourage rising talent, therefore, we cannot but think that a Philharmonic Concert is not the legitimate place for such appeal to be made. Let us say, however, that, as the work of a student, the Overture is undoubtedly clever. The Introduction, in F minor, with the scale passage for the grave string instruments, from which grows a melodious theme for the violins, the "Allegro con brio," forming the principal subject of the piece, and the "love motive," already alluded to, sufficiently prove that the author, were he not fettered by his design, might write good, if not attractive, music; and if he will only take the applause with which he was greeted at its true valuation, we may yet hear of him in the future. The other orchestral works in the programme were Beethoven's Symphony in B flat, No. 4, Handel's "Occasional" Overture, and Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody in D, all of which were played so finely as materially to raise the character of these Concerts, which, indeed, now appear to have taken a new lease of life. In place of Madame Schumann, whose state of health unfortunately prevents her coming to London this season, Mr. Oscar Beringer played Schumann's Concerto in A minor with much precision and executive power. and Madame Minnie Hauk, who made her first appearance at the Philharmonic Concerts, sang with excellent effect "Me voila seule," from "La Reine de Saba" (Gounod), and "My strength is spent," from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew.'

The third Concert, on the 26th ult., had a more varied and interesting programme, including the first of the new works written specially for the season. This was an orchestral serenade in E flat by Mr. Thomas Wingham, an English composer, who had already evinced high ability in several Concert overtures, which, like his new work, are prefixed by a few lines of poetry indicative of their general character, and the feelings they are intended to inspire. In the present instance, Mr. Wingham has chosen Shakespeare's lines "How sweet the moonlight sleeps upon this bank; Here will we sit, and let the sounds of music creep in our ears." This is suggestive of something light, fanciful, and soothing, and expectation is not disappointed. The Serenade is in three brief movements, Andante espressivo, Scherzino in B, and Allegro brillante quasi marcia. In the first and second the delicate orchestral effects merit attention, the writing for the wood wind and muted strings being very charming. The composer also displays his musicianship in playful little canons and phrases treated in imitation. More energy is exhibited in the finale, but the music never becomes strident or noisy. On the whole, we consider this to be Mr. Wingham's best effort, and it evidently made a highly favourable impression on the audience, for the composer received a double recall. A similar mark of favour was accorded to Herr Joachim after his masterly performance of Brahms's Violin Concerto, a work in which the interest lies wholly in the accompaniment. The solo part is terribly difficult and very unsympathetic, and it is therefore improbable that the concerto will ever become a favourite with violinists. Signor Bottesini's marvellous performances on the doublebass caused great excitement even among a Philharmonic audience, and the eminent virtuoso was compelled to accept an encore. A fine performance of Schumann's Symphony in C was given, the tone of the strings being superb. The vocal music consisted of two Sestets; the first was "Sola, sola," from Don Giovanni, which obtained a very indifferent rendering, and was received with disfavour. The other was "Oh, gracious power," from Gounod's "Reine de Saba," which went better, probably because it made less demands on the executants.

THE HECKMANN OUARTET.

THE rapid increase in the popularity of classical chamber music during the past few years received another proof in the interest taken in the appearances of the above-named Association of artists, first in the provinces and lastly in London. The attendance at the Concerts at the Princes' Hall, on February 26 and the 3rd ult., increased on each occasion, the final performance attracting a crowd of connoisseurs. The players, consisting of Herr R. Heckmann (first violin), Herr O. Forberg (second ditto), Herr T. Allecotte (viola), and Herr R. Bellmann (violoncello), come from Cologne. They have solicited the favour of music lovers in various German centres with unqualified success, their triumph in critical Vienna being especially brilliant. According to the press opinions of Dr. Hanslick, Dr. Russel, and others, their playing was "something unique," something "extraordinary"; it "put in the shade all our local quartets and famous quartet players." This is very high praise, and, of course, it excited the strongest expectations here, for Vienna is rightly or wrongly regarded as the metropolis of musical art. Some curiosity was mingled with this feeling, for we have at the Popular Concerts a set of players whom we have been accustomed to consider as unsurpassable. In what respects could the Heckmann Quartet exhibit its superiority to Mr. Arthur Chappell's artists? Before answering this question, let us glance at the programmes of the Princes' Hall Concerts. On the first occasion three quartets by Schubert, Schumann, and Beethoven were performed; on the second, three by Dittersdorff, Brahms, and Beethoven; and on the last, two by Beethoven. Few will feel disposed to quarrel with the prominence given to the works of the mighty Bonn master. But to make the programmes fully representative the names of Mozart, Mendelssohn and Spohr should have been included, even at the cost of omitting Dittersdorff and Brahms. It was quickly apparent that the distinctive feature in the performances was an absolutely perfect ensemble. As Hanslick observed, "every player not only knows his own part by heart, but also those of his colleagues." That this oneness of style and expression in quartet playing is in itself very charming must be readily admitted. One executant possessing a thin sweet tone and a refined feminine method would not blend with another whose style happened to be broad and impassioned; but at the same time it is questionable whether complete sacrifice of all individuality is an unmixed advan-Long association with one another, and probably careful study of each other's peculiarities, have resulted in a really remarkable homogeneity of style in the members of the Heckmann Quartet. Their execution resembles the working of a perfectly constructed machine, and in some works little more than this is needed. We confess, however, in the rendering of the final quartets of Beethoven, to have been conscious of the absence of an indefinable something, be it quality of tone, or passionate expression, or both, which completes the sense of satisfaction when these works are given under the leadership of Herr Joachim. This may seem hypercritical, but it is as well to mention it, while, at the same time, giving the Cologne players all the credit due to performances of rare merit, and in their way unsurpassable. At the final Concert some variety was afforded by a performance of the Kreutzer Sonata, in which Frau Heckmann gave a careful and unassuming rendering of the pianoforte part. Musicians will be glad to welcome the Heckmann Quartet whenever they choose to repeat their visit.

MR. BERINGER'S BACH CONCERT.

It was left for Mr. Oscar Beringer, alone among musical professors and executants in London, to celebrate the Bach bi-centenary by a performance of the master's works. At any other time such a programme as he offered at St. choral members of the Society, though in some places defi-

James's Hall on Wednesday afternoon, the 18th ult., would have been considered injudicious. But bi-centenary festivals are special occasions, and even four clavier concertos in succession may then pass as an illustration of one important branch of a composer's art work. Mr. Beringer selected the D minor Concerto for one clavier; the C minor for two; the C major for three; and the A minor for four. The second and third of these works used to be heard at the Popular Concerts, but latterly they have dropped out of the repertory. They are both in Bach's most vigorous and masterly style, skilful construction and musical effect proceeding hand in hand. The Concerto for four claviers was formerly regarded as an original work of Bach, but Spitta upset this view, proving it to be an arrangement of a work for four violins by Vivaldi. But, like Handel, Bach touched nothing that he did not adorn. This is how Spitta describes his share in the work. in the work:-" Bach has given the basses greater independence, and worked out the middle parts more richly and fully. He gives the solo instruments more work in counterpoint, and here and there the violin passages display a character more suited to the clavier, he also often adds a fuller accompaniment not unfrequently varied with episodes. . . . The work affords new evidence of the master's ingenuity in writing four obbligato parts, even in the lightest style." Oscar Beringer was assisted in the solo parts by Mr. Walter Bache, Mr. Franklin Taylor, and Mr. Alfred Richter, and with the aid of a select orchestra of fifteen strings, conducted by Mr. Manns, the works were heard to the utmost advantage. Madame Sterling gave a commendable rendering of the air "In Deine Hände," from the cantata "Gottes Zeit," but was less commendable in the song "Willst du dein Herz," which Spitta proves incontestably to have been the composition of an Italian named Giovanni.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY MUSICAL SOCIETY.

This Society, under whose auspices an uninteresting Concert is a thing unknown, and which might be for that reason, if for no other, taken as a model by many metropolitan institutions, gave a Concert of exceptional excellence on Friday, the 13th ut. Dr. Joachim, according to his annual custom, now happily established, visited Cambridge for the occasion, and appeared in one of the most effective and masterly of his compositions, the Hungarian Concerto for Violin and Orchestra. This work has been heard in London on more than one occasion, but is by no means so familiar with English audiences as it ought to be, for it is not merely a vehicle, as so many Concertos are, for the display of the solo instrument, but a composition of very great intrinsic importance. The Concerto, especially the finale, was rendered by the composer in a manner which fairly charmed the audience. In the later part of the programme Dr. Joachim played the G minor Prelude and Fugue of Bach, and, in answer to the unanimous recall, the Bourrée in the same key.

The central position in the Concert was occupied by Mr. C. V. Stanford's "Elegiac Ode," a setting of the noble lyric in Walt Whitman's "Burial of Abraham Lincoln," which was one of the most interesting novelties produced at the last Norwich Festival. The view of death taken by the poet, and reflected by the composer, has given rise to no little discussion, and to such animadversions as seem generally to fall to the lot of whatever Mr. Stanford does. But however strangely the jubilant accent in which the poet expresses his joyful anticipation of death-not for the sake of what follows death, but for its own sake-it must at least be conceded that the composer's duty is to represent in music the emotion which inspires the poem. From the solemn exultation of the opening, with its suave subject afterwards allied to the words "lovely and soothing Death," which serves as the motto of the whole composition, to the joyful rise and fall of the final fugue, which in its intricacy and elaboration stands alone among the composer's works, all is beautiful, and must be confessed as such even by those who consider the words as an affront to the King of Terrors. The melodious baritone solo "Dark mother, ever gliding near," was finely sung by Mr. Frederic King, and Miss Amy Aylward was fairly successful in the beautiful air with chorus " From me to thee, glad serenades." The cient in attack, acquitted themselves creditably, and the orchestra was admirable. The work, as well as the entire Concert, was conducted by Mr. Stanford. A fine performance of Beethoven's "Namensfeier" Overture opened, and Mozart's Symphony in D concluded the Concert.

DR. STAINER ON PSALM AND HYMN TUNES.

A HIGHLY interesting lecture on the subject of "Psalm and Hymn Tunes," was delivered by Dr. Stainer, at the London Institution, Finsbury Circus, on Thursday, February 26, with musical illustrations given by ten choristers and seven gentlemen of St. Paul's Cathedral, Dr. Martin presiding at the harmonium, and the lecturer himself at the pianoforte.

Dr. Stainer commenced by giving an account of the music of the Greek Church, which, he remarked, had not received the same attention as that of the Latin Church, and he then played the ancient Byzantine scale, explaining its Oriental origin, and pointing out the difference between this ancient scale and that of the Latin Church. With regard to the words of the ancient hymns, he remarked that both Greek and Latin authors had at first attempted to write in classical metres, but had soon discarded them, and abandoned the rules of prosody in favour of those of accent. The Latins developed the art of rhyming very early; the Greek Christians never adopted it to any great extent, but in its place they used a kind of metrical parallelism highly suitable for musical treatment.

Speaking of the attempts, so common in the present day, to restore to hymns of Latin origin the tunes that were first written to them, Dr. Stainer reminded his hearers that the art of music was then absolutely in its infancy, and that since the earliest Latin hymn tunes were merely rudimentary efforts at music-making, there was often much incongruity in associating such music with most refined and polished poetry. He then proceeded to speak of the music introduced into mediæval services and miracle plays, as illustrations of which the tune "Orientis partibus adventavit asinus" and the "Coventry Carol" were sung. The sudden growth of hymn-singing after the Reformation he attributed chiefly to the use of hymns in the vernacular, and then gave an account of the tunes composed by, and of those ascribed to Luther, pointing out the gradual alteration and modernising of these melodies, and illustrating them at the pianoforte, and then discussing the socalled "Luther's hymn," and playing a large number of various readings of the melody

The influence of Bach on the expansion of the choral could not, he said, be over-estimated; that great man devoted his high genius to the artistic treatment of these fine old melodies, an illustration of which was given by the singing of the choral "God, my King."

The lecturer then entered into the question of pauses at the end of the lines of the choral, and showed how the extension of a cadence had grown into the introduction of short symphonies on the organ, and finally into the introduction of such passages as those for the brass instruments in "Sleepers, wake." After singing Mendelssohn's setting, the choir gave Bach's harmonisation of the same melody, and other treatments of the choral were then noticed, and examples given of early Dutch and French Protestant Next followed a detailed account of the History of the Old Hundredth, which was sung by the choir in its original form (Claude Goudimel, 1542) then as printed by John Day (1563), next by Ravenscroft (1621); all of which settings were sung by the choir in their original state with the Canto Fermo in the tenor: the origin of the custom of placing the melody in the tenor being explained, and the date of its discontinuance being given, with contemporary views on the subject.

Some early English tunes from John Day's book were then sung, and the gradual development of melody pointed out, culminating in what the lecturer aptly termed the debased floriated style, although many very beautiful tunes (notably "Abridge," and "Rockingham") were composed during this period. Several examples of hymn-tunes were then sung exhibiting adaptations, curious harmonisation, and other peculiar treatments, including the old florid arrangement of the Evening Hymn (with its numerous Jurns and shakes) which was admirably sung by the boys.

Dr. Stainer concluded his lecture with some weighty remarks on the too rapid pace at which hymns were often sung, saying that he thought the clergy were much to blame in this matter in not permitting their organist, as was frequently the case, to use his own judgment is determining the proper rate of speed. He said, and the remark cannot be too often nor too strongly impressed on clergy and organist alike, that each tune had its own particular tempo, depending upon its date and its special characteristics; and that it would be just as absurd to insist on singing all Schumann's songs at one and the same tempo as to take all hymn tunes at one and the same pace.

The lecture, which lasted nearly two hours, was delivered from notes, not read. It was listened to with the greatest attention and was most warmly received. The illustrations throughout were admirably rendered by the choir.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

LUMINOUS by many beauties and memorable by the production of many works, whose composers, dead and living, are fast attaining their proper standing and repute in public opinion, the season 1884-5, with its successes and disappointments, is quickly waning to its close.

Mr. Hallé has now brought his series of Concerts to a happy termination, and by reserving his best fare till the last. has left behind a most pleasant recollection of judicious catering and discrimination. In referring to Herr Joachim's appearance at each of the last two Concerts of this series, comment is superfluous, and criticism gives place to unfeigned admiration of qualities which are simply incomparable. Herr Joachim's selection on February 24, com-prised a Concerto in G Minor by Max Bruch, and Tartini's 'Devil's Sonata." In the Bruch Concerto, which revived recollections of the composer's connection with this city some two or three years ago, the great violinist interpreted with perfect fidelity the spirit and intention of a work possessing real beauty and power. This was particularly evidenced in the Adagio, a movement of considerable grace and pathos. The programme also included the Andante movement for pianoforte and violin from Beethoven's Kreutzer Sonata, and amongst the orchestral selections, prominence was given to the instrumental portions of Berlioz's Symphony "Romeo and Juliet." As the solo vocalist at this Concert, Mrs. Hutchinson maintained her reputation for purity of production and finished execution. At the final Concert of this series, on the 10th ult., the exceptional opportunity of hearing side by side two such violinists as Madame Norman-Néruda and Herr Joachim naturally attracted to the Philharmonic Hall an audience whose numbers were only equalled by their enthusiasm. Bach's Concerto in D minor and an unaccompanied duet by Spohr constituted the respective items in which the combined power and astonishing execution of these artists were displayed. The very suspicion of comparison under such circumstances would be as invidious as uncalled for, and yet if any remark be justifiable, it is perhaps that those very circumstances somewha militated against their own complete success, by necessitating the sinking of the individuality throughout the entire evening of a violinist whose powers are so truly remarkable. The chief orchestral feature in addition to the Bach Concerto was Haydn's "La Reine de France ' Symphony—a work the melodious beauty of which is freely recognised, and which lent itself with peculiar facility to the plenitude of the string department of Mr. Halle's orchestra. The overture and introduction to the third act of "Lohengrin" also found a place in the programme, and its vivid colouring and bold instrumentation aroused the feelings of the audience in such a manner as to necessitate the repetition of the second portion. Perhaps this warmth of reception may be taken as a fitting testimony to the spread of Wagnerian principles, and a wider admiration for the true genius of a composer whose creations Mr. Hallé has done so much to popularise in Liverpool. Miss Hope Glenn, as the solo vocalist, confirmed previous impressions, and by her winning style and the judicious use of a rich contralto voice, made a pronounced success.

The Philharmonic Society has, at the time of writing, but one performance remaining to complete the season's programme. At the eleventh Concert, on the 3rd ult., monotony which appears recently to have gradually crept over this Society's appearances was relieved by the introduction to Liverpool of Berlioz's "L'Enfance du Christ," a trilogy of sterling merit, and as to the origin of which an interesting story is told to the advantage of the composer, and the chagrin of his critics. The cast included Miss Marianne Fenna, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Santley, and Mr. Hilton, who also took part in the rendering of Cherubini's Mass No. 4 in C, with which the Concert concluded. The chorus, if lacking occasionally in body and tone, sang throughout with intelligence and precision.

The Pianoforte Recital at St. George's Hall small Concert-room, on the afternoon of the 14th ult., served as a welcome home to Miss Dora Shirmacher, who, after a lengthened tour on the Continent, returns to Liverpool honoured with fresh laurels. In listening to Miss Shirmacher's interpretation of such compositions as Schubert's Fantasie in C major, Schumann's "Davidsbundler," or a pretty caprice by Moscheles, one cannot but recognise not only Miss Shirmacher's easy style of execution, but more particularly the deep sympathy and devotional feeling with which she invests all that she undertakes. This was specially noticeable in the Fantasie referred to. The programme also included two little compositions of the fair pianist, one of which, a sweet and rhythmical Intermezzo, secured a redemand.

The concluding Concert of the Philharmonic Choral Society's season took place in St. George's Hall, on the 19th ult., when Mendelssohn's Oratorio "St. Paul" was placed before a Liverpool audience on a scale which has not been equalled since the performance of the work at the Musical Festival of 1874. The Oratorio is one which revives old recollections, inasmuch as Liverpool, notwithstanding its then comparative unimportance, had the honour of first introducing "St. Paul" to an English audience in the year 1836, under the conductorship of Sir George Smart.

The recent performance of the Oratorio was sufficiently gratifying to form a satisfactory conclusion to the season's work. The principals comprised Miss Kate Winifred Payne, Miss Eleanor Rees, Mr. Hirwen Jones, and Mr. Franco Novara. The last mentioned artist, although apparently suffering from hoarseness, sang with his accustomed power and expression, and Miss Rees charmed her audience by her pathetic rendering of the air "But the Lord is mindful of His own." The chorus, numbering 300 voices, sang with great attention to the light and shade which is required throughout the choral portions of the work. This was particularly applicable to the soothing beauty of "Happy and blest," which stood out in fitting contrast to the grand volume of sound produced by the combination of forces in "O great is the depth" with which the first part concludes. Mr. Best, who had a most cordial reception, lent valuable assistance at the organ, and Mr. Randegger conducted with his accustomed ability

The Chamber Concert given at St. George's Hall on the afternoon of Saturday, the 21st ult., was a model of artistic perfection. It would be difficult to imagine a fitter combination for the interpretation of classical works than in the persons of Madame Norman-Néruda, Signor Piatti, and Mr. Charles Hallé, and the rendering of a new Trio by Dvorák, Op. 65, in F minor, and also that of Beethoven's Trio in B flat, Op. 97, were consequently as near the ideal as can ever be reasonably expected. The more one hears of Dvorák's compositions the more one is convinced that the unequivocal position to which he has now attained in popular favour is only commensurate with the genius and commanding grasp of or-chestral resources which stamp his writings. In the F minor Trio, this is as conspicuous as if the work had been planned for a full orchestra. The Allegretto, thoroughly Bohemian in its fantastical abandon, brings the composer's nationality and instincts as prominently to the fore as in many of his earlier works. Madame Norman-Néruda contributed two violin solos, the first being Spohr's Adagio in G, in vivid contrast to the succeeding number, Paganini's

"Mouvement Pérpetuel," the phenomenal technical difficulties of which were overcome with easy facility. It is sufficient to mention that an admirable programme was completed by three of Schubert's "Momens Musicaux, and also three "Stüke in Volkstone," played by Mr. Halle in his usual style.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

EVIDENCES abound of the rapidly approaching termina-tion of our musical season. Mr. Hallé finished on the 12th ult. his annual series of Concerts by a revival of Handel's "Jephtha"; having, since I last wrote, given several interesting programmes, notably one containing Bach's Concerto in D minor for two Violins, and Spohr's unaccompanied Duet in G minor, Op. 67. The opportunity of hearing together two such favourites as Madame Néruda and Herr Joachim attracted an audience resembling that lured by a great choral work. But it could not be said that either performer appeared to such advantage as when alone. Herr Joachim seemed to be controlled by a feeling of politeness, and not to play with quite his usual force and richness of tone; and the music undertaken was not fitted for the display of Madame Néruda's highest qualities. At the final Concert some signs of insufficient rehearsal were apparent, the choir and band being occasionally slightly at variance.

On the same evening (12th ult.) hundreds vainly sought admittance to the performance, at the Theatre Royal, of the "Lily of Killarney," which the veteran composer had been specially invited to conduct. After his most enthusiastic reception, and a very successful performance of a work which he has marvellously succeeded in investing with sympathetic national tone, Sir Julius Benedict was entertained at supper by the Brazennose Club, the chair being occupied by the president, Mr. G. Freemantle. In response to the good wishes of a large gathering of leading musical men, Sir Julius gave most interesting reminiscences of his early life, and of the great artists with whom he had been privileged to come in contact.

Carl Rosa had very large audiences; and, happily, the most crowded were on those evenings when English operas were given.

Mr. De Jong has completed his ten Concerts, and on his benefit night brought down a very strong force of vocalists. Throughout the whole season he has been most cordially supported. The Ballad Concert on the 2nd ult., for which Mr. Sims Reeves, Madame Georgina Burns, Mr. Leslie Crotty, and several other vocalists of eminence were engaged, was so successful that those who vainly sought admission had to be consoled by a second performance on

At the Concert Hall Mr. Halle's Pianoforte Recitals have become most popular, and arrangements for after-noon performances must, in future seasons, form a very important part of the scheme propounded by the directors of the Gentlemen's Concerts. The orchestral performance of the 9th ult. being the last of the series, and also in many ways enticing, was very well attended. In Beetmany ways entiring, was very wein attended. In Beet-hoven's Pastoral Symphony, and in Bach's Suite in D, the band showed to great advantage, in spite of the un-suitability of the hall for a large staff of players. Madame Néruda selected Max Bruch's Scotch Concerto, a post-humous Adagio by Spohr, and "Le mouvement perpétuel" of Paganini, and was very warmly and most deservedly cheered. Mr. Watkin Mills, who has fulfilled several engagements in Manchester during the month, was received with great encouragement.

In the same Hall Madame Essipoff gave, after my last report was despatched, a very interesting pianoforte recital. The programme was chronologically arranged, and had, therefore, a certain educational value. The whole performance was most enjoyable, and was relieved by some songs by Miss Bertha Moore.

Miss Amina Goodwin was favoured, on the 19th ult., with a larger attendance than heretofore at her Pianoforte Recitals. In a very varied programme she displayed considerable executive skill and self-possession. Doubtless, author's intentions, and more depth of expression.

On Monday evening, the 23rd ult., the Athenaum Musical Society gave to its customary crowded assembly of subscribers, the final Concert of a successful season; during which several important English works have been performed for the first time in Manchester. The efforts of the choir were as refined as usual, and the solos proved the merit of the individual members of the Society. The rendering of Verdi's "Tacea la Notte," and of Donizetti's duet "Ah! figlia incanta," excited enthusiastic applause.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

THE rough outline of the scheme for the Birmingham Musical Festival of August next is now complete, and judging from the reception accorded to it by the general committee at their meeting on the 6th ult., it is evidently not destined to disappoint even the high expectations which had been formed of it. There is certainly no lack in it of the three cardinal virtues of a musical programmenovelty, interest, and promise of excellence. Besides M. Gounod's colossal Requiem, "Mors et Vita," to which previous reference has been made, there will be seven other new works of importance, of which no less than six are of native production—viz., Dr. Bridge's setting of Mr. Gladstone's Latinised version of "Rock of Ages," Dr. Villiers Stanford's new oratorio "The three Holy Children," Mr. Cowen's Cantata "The Sleeping Beauty, Mr. Thomas Anderton's "Yule-tide," Mr. Ebenezer Prout's new Symphony, and Mr. Mackenzie's Violin Concerto. The eighth, and certainly not least, interesting novelty promised us is Dvorák's legendary Cantata, "The Spectre's Bride," which has been for some time past in active rehearsal by the full choir. The list of artists engaged is an imposing one, and the appointment of Herr Richter as generalissimo of the Festival army, in succession to the late Sir Michael Costa, affords a guarantee for thoroughness and efficiency in every branch of the musical executive.

The musical section of the Midland Institute gave a Concert of exceptional interest on the afternoon of the 7th ult., when the entertainment assumed a classical chamber form, and the burden devolved upon the eminent violinist, Mr. J. T. Carrodus, and a local pianist, Mrs. Hale. The several performances of Mr. Carrodus were distinguished by his accustomed brilliancy, power, and refinement of style. Among his most successful efforts may be named a Ballade, Andante, and Allegretto, by Molique, Op. 47, and Bach's great Chaconne in D minor. Mrs. Hale, besides accompanying Mr. Carrodus, played with good taste and finished execution, Schumann's "Humoreske," Op. 20, and the Rigaudon from Raff's Orchestral Suite in B flat, Op. 204. The two artists afterwards united their efforts Op. 204. The two artists afterwards united that the with those of Mr. A. J. Priestley, in Mendelssohn's D minor Trio, Op. 49. The vocal pieces contributed by Miss Rosa James were Mozart's "Voi che sapete," Gounod's "Valley," and Pinsuti's "Sleep on, dear love.

The last of the current series of Messrs. Harrison's Subscription Concerts, which took place on the 4th ult., was distinguished, as usual, by the presence and co-operation of Mr. Charles Hallé and his admirable band, with whom were associated on this occasion, Miss Clara Samuell and Madame Patey. The special feature of interest was Dvorák's great Symphony in D, which was first heard in this country at the Crystal Palace in April 1882, when the bold and original character of the work deeply impressed even those of its hearers who failed to fathom its full significance. Herr Joachim's rendering of Mendelssohn's violin Concerto in E minor was distinguished by breadth, fire, and volume of tone. The Finale, taken at a break-neck pace, was simply a marvel of mechanism allied to well ordered enthusiasm. In a Barcarole and Scherzo of Spohr, Dr. Joachim subsequently afforded the audience an impressive glimpse of the lighter and more fanciful graces of his art, and in response to the enthusiastic encore which greeted him he performed with squal skill and effect a favourite Gavotte from one of Bach's Violin Suites. Mr. Charles Hallé played with his accustomed ease and finish Weber's ever welcome "Invitation à la Valse," and in response to the encore which greeted that performance, time and experience will bring a keener insight into the he played the popular Valse in D flat by Chopin. Miss Clara Samuell greatly delighted the audience by her singing of the two Mozart airs "Batti batti" and "Voi che sapete," whilst Madame Patey's selection comprised the air "Voce di Donna" from Ponchielli's "Gioconda" and a new song by Sir Arthur Sullivan, entitled " A shadow. In Rossini's duet, "Giorno d' orrore," the two ladies united their efforts with excellent effect. The overtures to "Fidelio" and "William Tell," Gounod's "Funeral March of a Marionette," and Wagner's "Tannhäuser" March, all admirably played, completed the orchestral selection.

A new departure in musical matters was initiated here on the 16th, when Messrs. Rogers and Priestley, a leading local firm of musicsellers, paid their friends and business connections the compliment of inviting them to a Concert of classical chamber music in the large room of the Grand Hotel. There was a varied and well-selected programme, representing chiefly composers of the orthodox German schools, from Mozart to Goetz, and ample justice was done to the selection by Messrs. F. Ward and T. M. Abbott (violins), Mr. E. W. Priestley (viola), Mr. A. J. Priestley (violoncello), and Miss Welchman (pianoforte). Spohr's (violoncello), and Miss Welchman (planoforte). Sponr's duet in E minor, Op. 13, for violin and viola, was admirably played by Messrs, F. Ward and T. M. Abbott, and the first named artist also distinguished himself greatly in a violin solo from Franz Ries' Suite in G major, No. 3, Op. 34. Miss Welchman exhibited excellent technique in Chopin's Ballade in G minor, Op. 23, and a well-balanced performance of Mendelssohn's string Quartett in E minor, No. 2, Op. 44, brought the Concert to an effective conclusion. In the opening Trio for piano and strings by Hermann Goetz, in G minor, Op. 1, Miss Welchman and Messrs. F. Ward and A. J. Priestley showed a sympathetic and thorough appreciation of the composer's style and peculiarities.

The appearance of Mr. Sims Reeves at a ballad Concert, given in the Town Hall, on the 19th ult., drew, as usual, a large and enthusiastic audience. With Mr. Reeves were associated Miss Annie Marriott, Miss Hope Glenn, and Mr. Ivor McKay, vocalists; and in the instrumental department, Miss Nettie Carpenter, violinist, Signor Bisaccia, pianist, and Mr. Sidney Naylor, Conductor. Signor Foli had been announced to take part in the Concert, but, though in the hall, he was too hoarse to sing, and Mr. Reeves and Mr. McKay kindly contributed an additional song each, to compensate for their colleague's defection. The audience was agreeably surprised to find Mr. Reeves in better voice and apparent condition than he has been for some years past. His first effort, Balfe's "Blighted flower," was distinguished by unaccustomed fulness and firmness of tone, but his great triumph was in Braham's well-worn patriotic song "Nelson," the declamatory portions of which were renthe declamatory portions of which were rendered by Mr. Reeves with astonishing vigour and power. In place of the duet "All's well," which he was to have sung with Signor Foli, the popular tenor sang Balfe's "Come into the garden, Maud," with a suavity, tenderness, and vocal power, which he has seldom excelled, and which on this occasion excited the enthusiasm of the audience to the highest pitch. Miss Marriott was effective in Bishop's "Tell me my heart," and Miss Hope Glenn won great applause by her singing of Hullah's "Three fishers," Becker's "Springtide," and "The Baliff's Daughter of Islington." Mr. McKay met with a flattering reception, and in compliance with a hearty encore, had to repeat a part of his second song, Piccolomini's "Saved by a Child." The young American violinist, Miss Nettie Carpenter, who made her first appearance in Birmingham on this occasion, fairly took the audience by storm in virtue of her rare musical intelligence, good tone, and neat and finished execution, as exhibited more particularly in a duo concertante, by Pixis, in which she was joined by Signor Bisaccia, and a couple of show pieces by Vieuxtemps and Wieniawski. In one of Liszt's Rhapsodies, a Valse of Chopin, and two short movements by Mendelssohn, Signor Bisaccia displayed remarkable skill, power

Of the last musical event of the month, the concluding Concert of the Festival Choral Society on the 26th, when Spohr's "Last Judgment" and Smart's "Bride of Dunkerron "were performed, I must reserve details until my next.

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

In point of importance, as well as in order of date, the Handel Bi-centenary Festival performance at Bradford on February 24, demands the foremost place in this record of the month's events. The celebration took the form of two Concerts, that in the morning being devoted to the performance of "Judas Maccabæus," and the other to the rendering of a miscellaneous and representative selection from Handel's works generally. The Festival was, in every respect, a fitting tribute to the memory of the great musical hero, though the attendance, especially in the morning, was not so large as could have been desired. The proceeds of the Festival were intended to be divided among the local charities, but the balance-sheet was such as to necessitate a call upon the guarantors. As to the ability of the Bradford Festival Choral Society, to do justice to Handel's choruses generally, it is needless to offer any remark; but their singing, especially at the morning per-formance, surpassed all expectation, and to them the chief honour of the day was unanimously accorded. For volume and beauty of sound, musical phrasing, and precision of entry, nothing could have been finer than the chorus-singing in the oratorio. Not only choir, however, but principals also used every effort and artistic accomplishment to fitly achieve the object of the Festival, and it seemed as if the coldness of a section of the public added warmth and enthusiasm to all who were concerned in the performance. The solo work was en-trusted to Miss Anna Williams, Miss Thudichum, Madame Patey, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Santley, all of whom sang with great success. The finished efforts of Miss Williams, and the fervour and artistic treatment brought to bear by Mr. Lloyd and Mr. Santley, made a very great impression. Miss Hope Glenn and Mr. Bridson were also among the principal vocalists, but took part only at the evening Concert, which brought forth many interesting items, and added fresh laurels to chorus and solo performers. The band, which was led by Mr. Carrodus, was scarcely equal in point of refinement to the remainder of the executive forces, but in all other respects the accompaniments were efficient. The Conductor was Mr. Burton, to whom much of the credit of such admirable chorus singing must necessarily attach.

The twentieth season of the Bradford Subscription Concerts terminated on the 6th ult. by a performance of Dvorák's "Stabat Mater," on which occasion St. George's Hall was well nigh filled in every part. Bradford amateurs owe much to the Society, and to Mr. Hallé and the Festival Choral Society for the production of a work so remarkable and difficult of inter-pretation. Beyond fragmentary selections the public of Yorkshire have had but little acquaintance with the compositions of the Bohemian master, whose work is destined to have an important influence upon future musical history. The performance amply confirmed what we have been so often told as to the extraordinary nature and characteristics of this the latest development of Dvorák's genius. Its devotional pathos and solemnity were admirably preserved in the rendering, and the work created a deep impression. The musical resources demanded by the composer were employed in full measure, and there was neither confusion nor want of intelligence on the part of the performers. The audience were thus enabled to comprehend and appreciate Dvorák's freedom of harmonic method, and the beauty and variety of his creative power. The freshness and profundity of his themes and the rich combinations in which he has clothed them, his charming treatment of the orchestral parts, and the fulness of musical expression, were realised with all the clearness that subtle phrasing, delicacy of contrast, and finished vocal and instrumental culture could give them. The Festival Choral Society had a much more difficult task to discharge than on the occasion of the Handel Festival, and it served to display their powers in fresh artistic and it served to dispray their powers in nest action colours, the band bringing both accuracy and finish to bear on their work. The principal parts were sung by Miss Anna Williams, Madame Patey, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Bridson. The second part of the Concert included the control of the Concert included the Concert i Saba," and other items for principals, chorus, and orchestra.

The Concert was a very fitting close of a memorable season.

Another valuable series of Concerts—the Leeds Popular Concerts-was brought to a close on the 3rd ult. Local interest in Mr. Rawlinson Ford's movement for extending the taste for chamber music has been well sustained during the winter, and the results have been such as to encourage him in announcing a fresh series of Concerts for 1885-6three of chamber and three of orchestral music—an announcement which will be received with general satisfaction among musical amateurs. The last Concert of the series now concluded, was marked by another visit from Herr Joachim, whose unique powers were once more dis-played in the rendering of Sebastian Bach's Sixth Sonata, and in Spohr's "Duo Concertante" (Op. 39) with Herr Peiniger, and other concerted items. Among the latter were Beethoven's Quartet in E flat (Op. 74), and Schumann's well-known piano Quintet. The executants, besides Herr Joachim and Herr Peiniger, included Madame Frickenhaus, Mr. A. Gibson, and Mr. Charles Ould. Madame Frickenhaus played as a solo Schumann's "Fas-chingsschwank aus Wien," which was very favourably received, and she also joined Mr. Ould in Chopin's Introduction and Polonaise. The vocalist was Mdlle. Lenari, whose selections required extremely brilliant vocalisation, and on that account were scarcely suited to the quality of her voice, which is pure and sweet, rather than strong and flexible.

The fifth annual Concert of the College Chapel Musical Society (Bradford) took place on the 17th ult., when Dr. Stainer's Cantata "St. Mary Magdalene" was given, with the assistance of an orchestra and principals, the latter being Miss A. Cockcroft, Miss Lily Parratt, Mr. William Coates and Mr. George Owen. The chorus numbered about seventy performers, who gave some of the choruses with admirable effect. The band proved scarcely equal to the occasion, but the performance generally was a fairly creditable one. Dr. March was the Conductor.

Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" was produced on the 17th ult. by the Garforth Choral Society, a newly organised institution, which, under the direction of Dr. Creser, is making great progress. This, the second Concert, was remarkable for great improvement in point of tone and general artistic quality.

The last of the series of Concerts in connection with the Highfield Lectures and Entertainments was given in the Huddersfield Town Hall on the 18th ult. The executants were Miss Mary Davies, Miss Agnes Zimmermann and Mr. Carrodus. The Concert was a great artistic success.

The Huddersfield Choral Society produced "The Creation," on the 20th ult. The chorus was over 300 strong, and the band was proportionately numerous. The ensemble effects were exceedingly fine. The soloists were Miss Thudichum, Mr. Guy, and Mr. Bartin—the latter a member of the Society. The Conductor was Mr. Joshua Marshall.

Dr. Spark's Organ Recitals at the Leeds Town Hall continue to attract large audiences. A notable feature at one or two recent Concerts has been the Handel Commemoration March, written by the Organist with his accustomed skill and facility. The work has elicited many favourable opinions.

The other items in the evening's entertainment were Mendelssohn's Overture to "Athalie," which was capitally played; Meyerbeer's Overture, "L'Etoile du Nord," and Liszt's fascinating Hungarian Rhapsody in F, No. 1, which was even better rendered than on the former occasion of its performance, just before Christmas. The beautiful Largo of Handel, which is ever a favourite at these Concerts, was played with telling effect by Mr. Carrington (violin), Mr. Cheshire (harp), and Mr. Riseley (organ), Mr. John Barrett conducting. A selection from "I Puritani" brought the evening to a close. The vocalist was Mr. Musgrove Tufnail, who sang three solos extremely well, his enunciation being particularly clear. Mr. Carrington was the leader, and Mr. George Riseley conducted as usual.

30th Saturday Popular Concert by the Bristol Musical Association was given in Colston Hall, on the 14th ult., when the chief item was Beethoven's Cantata "The Praise of Music." The principal vocalists were Miss Marianne Fenna, Miss Berta Forrester, Mr. E. T. Morgan, and Mr. J. F. Mather. Mr. Riseley presided at the organ and contributed two solos, one of which was Batiste's "Angelic Voices," given for the first time in Bristol. Mr. Gordon conducted.

On the 18th ult. the general rehearsal for the Western Counties Musical Association's annual Festival was held in the Victoria Hall, the result auguring well for the success of the Festival.

The same evening a miscellaneous Concert was given by members of the Association, under the direction of the local Conductor. Haydn's Symphony in C, No. 7, and Beethoven's Overture "The Men of Prometheus" were creditably performed by the band. Mr. M. G. Rice's violin solo with organ accompaniment, Handel's Largo in G, was encored, Henry Smart's "Spring," and two part-songs by Mendelssohn were exceedingly well sung by the Cullompton Branch, and Eaton Faning's spirited part-song "The Miller's wooing" was sung with much effect by the Exeter Branch. The Overture to "Zampa," as an organ solo, and sundry other instrumental solos, songs, &c., made up a very interesting and successful Concert.

The Orchestral Society announces a Concert for the 9th inst., and the Oratorio Society has in rehearsal Macfarren's

"St. John the Baptist."

The eighth, and last but one, of the present series of Monday Popular Concerts took place in Colston Hall, on the 23rd ult., the audience being a fairly large one. It was a highly interesting Concert from more than one point of view, introducing as it did our talented fellow citizen, Mr. Roeckel, as a composer for orchestra, and giving us an opportunity of again hearing Mr. Walter Macfarren, who is now quite an established favourite in Bristol. The first part of the exceptionally fine programme consisted of Mendelssohn's exquisite Overture "Fingal's Cave," and Beethoven's Symphony in C minor, No. 5, separated by the aria "Hear ye, Israel," from "Elijah," which was the same recarging the same state of the Symphony was as near perfection as possible, taking into due consideration the resources of the band. In parts the strings were, as usual, somewhat overbalanced, and we begin to despair of seeing the citizens generously come forward to remedy this defect. There is certainly no sign of this at present, which is the more to be regretted as it really only remains for the band to be strengthened for it to take a very high, if not the highest, place among provincial orchestras. The present members are admirable vincial orchestras. The present members are admirable musicians, as was abundantly exemplified throughout the whole Concert, and one only longs now to add twenty to their number. The second part commenced with Mr. W. Macfarren's Concertstück in E minor and major for piano and orchestra, which we had the pleasure of hearing him play last year at one of these Concerts. His delightful performance of it received a hearty encore, to which he responded by playing Chopin's beautiful Nocturne in F sharp. Mr. Roeckel was warmly recalled after conducting his new orchestral Suite, and a selection from "Lucia di Lammermoor," and two songs from Miss Etherington, brought to a close one of the most successful Concerts, musically speaking, of the season.

On the following night Mr. Walter Macfarren delivered an interesting lecture on "Beethoven as a pianoforte writer." in the Lecture Room of the Bristol Museum, before a large and very closely packed audience. He was most cordially received, and proceeded at once to his subject. He said that Beethoven, perhaps more than any other musician, had developed the resources of the pianoforte, and by his rich legacies to that instrument had done more than any other composer to ennoble its literature. He thought, therefore, that his work in this direction, apart from the wider field of his labours, was a subject worthy of consideration. The lecturer then gave a concise but well considered history of Beethoven's life, mentioning some of the chief incidents therein, and enumerated his works, concluding by giving illustrations from his different styles in such a thoroughly musicianly manner as delighted his audience. He chose his programme as follows-Sonata pathétique, Op. 13; Funeral March and Allegro from Sonata No. 12, Op. 26, the two last movements from Sonata 9, Op. 14, No. 1; Rondo in G, Op. 51, No. 2; Bagatelles in F, A, and E flat, Op. 33; and lastly, thirty-two variations, which latter the lecturer considered to be one of the noblest of Beethoven's contributions to the pianoforte. He believed that such combined power and delicate expression had hardly ever been equalled, and he played them from memory, as indeed he did the whole of his programme, in a manner which called forth the heartiest plaudits from his auditors.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW AND THE WEST OF

CONCERTS by church choirs and others of the lesser musical associations have been pretty numerous during the past four or five weeks. A performance of Mr. A. R. Gaul's Cantata "Ruth" was given by the choir of Hillhead Congregational Church, on February 26, conducted by Mr. A. McColl, Organist of the church. The choir sang fairly well, and the solos in the Cantata were effectively rendered. A selection of miscellaneous pieces followed.

The directors of the City Hall Saturday Evening Concerts varied the usual nature of their popular and philan-thropic scheme of entertainments by giving a recital of Mr. John Farmer's operetta "Cinderella," on February 28. The characters were sustained by local artists and with more or less dramatic and musical ability, but the costumes were somewhat incongruous. There were no scenic accessories (no doubt from the hall not being licensed for theatrical entertainments), but the story being a household one, the imagination had no difficulty in supplying what was deficient. The accompaniments were rendered by a small orchestra, with piano, and Mr. W. M. Miller, whose choir sang the choruses with vigour and in very good tune, successfully conducted.

We had a fortnight's performances, terminating on the 7th ult., of the "Pirates of Penzance," by Mr. D'Oyly Carte's Juvenile Troupe, in the Royalty Theatre, to fairly good audiences. I do not offer any opinion upon the propriety, musically or otherwise, of such representations, particularly as the subject was sufficiently referred to in the article "Precocious Talent" in last month's MUSICAL TIMES, but I may say that most people who give the matter any thought are not favourable to them. We had here some time ago, I may mention, what was surely an equally objectionable exhibition, the Children's " Messiah."

The Choir of Kent Road United Presbyterian Church gave a Concert of Sacred and Secular Vocal Music, on the 10th ult. Mr. James McEwan conducted, and Miss A. Kerr accompanied. On the same evening the Choir of Greenhead United Presbyterian Church, in the eastern district of the City, gave a performance of Mozart's Twelfth Mass, with selections from Haydn's "Creation," &c. The accompaniments were skilfully played by an orchestra (led by Mr. W. H. Cole), an attraction which is often absent when the Mass is rendered by choirs; and under the bâton of Mr. A. D. Inglis, Choirmaster of the church, the performance was in all respects a very satisfactory one. Mr. P. E. Halsted, it should be mentioned, lent useful service at a Liszt organ.

College and Academy of Music for the Blind, Upper Norwood, took place on the 12th ult, in St. Andrew's Hall. The programme was both varied and interesting. Several part-songs and madrigals were sung by a select choir, Mendelssohn's motett "Hear my prayer" being effectively presented, with Miss Campbell in the principal part. The choir-singing showed a decided advance on that of former Concerts here, this being particularly exemplified in the unaccompanied male-voice chorus of Pilgrims from "Tannhäuser" with its difficult modulations. Several pianoforte pieces were played with skill, and under the peculiar circumstances, remarkable exactness. A preference seemed to be shown for Liszt, two of the three pieces being by that composer, probably from their specially giving an opportunity of exhibiting mani-pulative talent. The players were Miss Jeannie Gilbert, Mr. A. Hollins, who has been here several times, and Mr. F. Turner, a former pupil, and now Organist of one of the largest Dissenting churches in town. Mr. Turner played, with Mr. T. Perks, variations by Saint-Saëns, on a theme by Beethoven. Mr. Fritz Hartvigson, pianist, took part also in the Concert. The attendance was smaller than the Concert, apart from its object, was deserving of.

A Concert of sacred music was given by the members of the Psalmody and Musical Association, of Queen's Park United Presbyterian Church, on Friday evening, the 13th ult. choir numbered about fifty voices. Dr. Garrett's anthem, "In humble faith and holy love," which headed the programme was sung with great taste, the treble solo being marked by artistic grace. Sullivan's part song "The way is long and dreary" gave the altos an opportunity of distinguishing themselves, and Dr. Stainer's fine anthem for a double choir, "I saw the Lord," was rendered with due impressiveness. Sullivan's "Festival Te Deum" followed, and into the interpretation of this brilliant setting of the ancient hymn, the choir put all its strength. The soprano solos were effectively delivered by a young lady of most promising vocal ability. Mr. W. T. Hoeck, Organist of the Church, conducted. Mr. E. J. Wareham officiated at the organ, contributing two solos.

A Charity Concert under the patronage of the Lord Provost and magistrates, took place on the 16th ult. in the City Hall. Mr. Channon Cornwall's Choir, the Albert Select Choir, under Mr. J. Lillie, and Mr. Taggart's Male Voice Choir, numbering in all 100 voices, gave their services and sang separately and in union. It would be unbecoming in the circumstances to criticise, but the singing, despite the discouraging effect of a very small audience, was very creditable, particularly when the three choirs were united. For the credit of the citizens I incline to attribute the pecuniary failure of the Concert to insufficient publicity.

The Ladies' Choir connected with Hillhead Established Church gave a Concert of sacred music on the same even-The programme included selections from Pergolesi's "Stabat Mater," &c.

The Glasgow Tonic Sol-fa Choral Society, which has so long been conducted by Mr. W. M. Miller, gave a performance on the 17th ult., the first in Scotland, of A. C. Mackenzie's dramatic Oratorio, "The Rose of Sharon," in presence of an audience which, if it did not fully occupy St. Andrew's Hall, was yet sufficiently large to testify to the interest of the musical citizens in this new work by their countryman. The soloists were Mrs. Hutchinson, Miss Hope Glenn (in room of Miss Hilda Wilson), Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Watkin Mills. The orchestra was not large, but was composed of fairly competent executants, led by Mr. T. Smyth, a local violinist of taste and experience. Dr. Peace presided at the organ. With the chorus there were about 500 performers on the platform. Mr. Miller's Society has always excelled in the female voices, especially in the alto, and on this occasion they again bore the palm over the other parts. The female chorus "Art thou so simple," was sung very tunefully, and with not a little grace, which may be said all through of the soprano and alto share of the choruses. On the other hand the tenors and basses were somewhat immature in quality, the

The annual Concert here by pupils of the Royal Normal | be made up for by enthusiasm and energy, while it must be recorded that the vocalisation generally was very seldom at fault. It need not be said how well the intensely impassioned music of the Sulamite and the Beloved was rendered by Mrs. Hutchinson and Mr. Lloyd, nor with what impressiveness and dignity that assigned to the chief contralto voice, was delivered by Miss Hope Glenn. To Mr. Watkin Mills, in the part of Solomon, his first appearance in Glasgow, very high praise can be given. The Oratorio made a very decided impression, being regarded on all hands as a work of great and original genius. The Tonic Sol-fa Society is to be congratulated on its enterprise in being the first to perform Mr. Mackenzie's composition in

A Concert of Sacred music was given by the choir of Anderston U. P. Church on the 17th ult., Mr. A. Black conducting. Mendelssohn's Thirteenth Psalm was the principal number in a well selected programme.

The Glee Club, male and female voices, or Musical Association as it should rather be named, connected with the 1st Lanarkshire Rifle Volunteer Regiment, held its annual Concert on the 24th ult., in the Queen's Rooms.
The late Mrs. Meadows White's spirited setting of Kingsley's "Ode to the North East Wind" was included in the programme, and was excellently sung to a pianoforte accompaniment. Captain H. McNabb conducted, and Mr. Luther Hall was at the piano.

A performance of A. R. Gaul's Cantata "Ruth" was given by the choir of Caledonia Road U. P. Church, on the 24th ult. Anthems by Bridge, Barnett and others were likewise sung. Mr. J. M. Kerr conducted, and Mr. G. W.

Hopper accompanied.

A Concert of Gaelic melodies, sung in the original, and in four-part harmony, was given on the 24th ult., by the Gaelic Choir of St. Columba Church, in the hall of the Christian Institute. The comparative novelty of the music attracted a good audience. To very few present could the language be a known one, but its extreme aptness for vocal purposes would be obvious to all. The choir, which consisted of about fifty members, was conducted by Mr. A. Ferguson.

At the royal burgh of Campbeltown, in Argyllshire, the higher tastes of the inhabitants are by no means neglected, as is proved by the existence of the Campbeltown Musical Association, under the patronage of some of the leading townsfolk, and now in its sixth session. The society gave a Concert on February 25, with Van Bree's "St. Cecilia's Day "as the chief attraction, in which Mrs. Brien rendered the florid solo part with much skill. The rest of the programme embraced part-songs, songs, &c. Mr. J. W. Allen conducted, and Mr. James Connah accompanied on the piano.

The Musical Association of Lenzie, near Glasgow, performed Farmer's Mass in B flat, on February 25, in the Established Church, some anthems following. Mr. John Turnbull conducted, and Dr. Peace accompanied on the organ, and played some solos.

In connection with the Stirling Choral Society is an amateur operatic club. A series of performances of Sullivan's "Trial by Jury" and "H. M. S. Pinafore," was given by its members, on the last three days of February. The singing and acting were highly creditable to all taking part. The same company performed "Patience" two years ago.

The Paisley Glee Club (male voices) gave an open night

Horsley's "By Celia's Arbour," &c.

The last of the series of Saturday afternoon Concerts in the George A. Clark Town Hall, took place on the 21st ult. One of the principal attractions of the Concerts, of which fifteen have been given, has been the performances by Mr. Barratt on the fine organ of the hall. The attendances have been very good throughout.

The annual Concert of the Choir of Cumbernauld Parish Church, took place in the Drill Hall, on the 5th ult., the Conductor being Mr. James Fleming. Several anthems and sacred solos were sung in the first part of the programme, and some part-songs, &c., in the second part, with instrumental selections. Miss Pearson, contralto, tenors and basses were somewhat immature in quality, the with instrumental selections. Miss Pearson, contralto, former part being also few in proportionate number; but Mr. A. Finlayson, tenor, and Mr. G. Muirhead, violinist, what was wanting thereby in body of tone was sought to assisted, Messrs. Lee and Turnbull accompanying. The Musical Association of Shettleston, east from Glasgow, gave a Concert, on the 20th ult., of Scottish melodies, arranged as part-songs or in the usual form,

Mr. G. Pettigrew conducting.

The choir of Greenbank Church, Busby, Lanarkshire. made a musical appeal on behalf of the benevolent fund of the church on the 24th ult., a goodly amount being realised. The programme was exclusively sacred, and comprised several favourite anthems, such as Goss's "O taste and see," Stainer's "Ye shall dwell in the land," and Himmel's "Incline Thine ear." Mr. W. S. MUSIC IN AMERICA. (FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

New York, March 6, 1885. The period which has elapsed since I last reviewed the condition of musical affairs in the United States has been crowded with incidents. Most of the happenings have been indicative of a healthy progress, and it can be said, in a general way at the outset, that in nearly all the large cities, especially in New York, the season has been more than ordinarily brilliant. Just now, however, in this city, several of the leading institutions are staggering under the blow dealt them by the death of Dr. Damrosch. It is seldom that the activity of one man extends so far as was the case with the late director of the German opera. In the thirteen years of his labours in this city he had built up the Oratorio and Symphony Societies, and given them an influence second to none in the country. He had then taken advantage of the demoralised condition of our operatic affairs and established German opera on so good a footing that it seemed likely to be successful for some time to come, and to make itself a most potent influence in the elevation of the musical taste of the larger cities of the country. The death of Dr. Damrosch, which occurred after a four days' illness, on February 15, has thrown our operatic affairs into the greatest confusion. letter I called attention to the fact that the establishment of German opera at the Metropolitan Opera House was only a last resort, the directors having frittered away the entire spring and summer in negotiations with Mr. Gye. Even after Dr. Damrosch took the helm many of the directors were fearful of the outcome, and did not cease to hanker after the fleshpots of Italy. The season, how-ever, was phenomenally successful. Between November 17 and February 21 fifty-seven representations were given, the list of operas being as follows:—"Tannhäuser," nine times; "Lohengrin," nine; "Der Prophet," nine; "Die Wälkure," seven; "Die Hugonotten," five; "Die Jüdin," five; "Fidelio," three; "Wilhelm Tell," three; "Die Stumme von Portici," three; "Don Juan," two; "Der Freischütz," one; "Rigoletto," one. The prospectus issued last fall had announced twenty-two operas. so it will be seen that fulfillment fell short of performance by ten operas. This was partly owing to the unexpected popularity won by the Wagner operas and Meyerbeer's "Prophet," and the discovery made after the season had opened that the lighter order of operas, or such as contained spoken dialogue, were not well received by the public. Had there been time, there is no doubt that "Rienzi" would have followed "Die Walkure," and added to the prosperity which distinguished all the Wagnerian operas. The attendance throughout the season was far greater than had been enjoyed by any of the recent Italian companies, and the favour of the public was so markedly with the German enterprise that Mr Mapleson, with Patti, Nevada, and Scalchi as his "stars," concluded his season at the Academy of Music, with ruin seemingly staring him in the face. He bettered his fortunes a little at Boston and Philadelphia, but failed again in New Orleans and St. Louis. He has just opened a season at San Francisco which will probably bring him more money than he ever took in the same period in all his career. To the people of the Pacific slope Italian opera is a rare and delightful luxury, and this time the patriotic interest in director, which occurred one day after the directors of the Opera House had signed a contract under which Dr. Damrosch was to organise and direct another season, beginning in the fall of 1885, and reaching to the spring of 1886. After a most impressive Memorial Service in the Opera House, in which the various organisations which Dr. Damrosch had directed took part, the three representations which remained to be given took place under the direction of Herr Lund, of Berlin (Kroil's), whom Dr. Damrosch had brought to this city as chorus-master, and Daminosch had brought to this city as thousands and the company departed from the city to fill engagements in Chicago, Cincinnati, and Boston. In these three cities the reports of the success which had crowned the German enterprise in New York had stirred up an ardent desire to witness similar representations, and test the effectiveness of good ensemble work in dramatic masterpieces, as compared with the slip-shod and one-sided performances which the Italian companies have given for years. The representa-tions in Chicago which have been given thus far have been conducted by Walter Damrosch, son of the dead conductor, and Herr Lund.

Had Dr. Damrosch not died the future of German opera would have been much brighter than it is now. Metropolitan directors had resolved to continue the experiment next season, and were more than pleased at the financial outcome this year. They had declined to assume any responsibility beyond a fixed sum offered as a subscription to Mr. Abbey and Mr. Gye when they attempted to arrange for another series of Italian performances. In order to secure the German company they had themselves to become entrepreneurs, Dr. Damrosch being simply their agent. An exact report of the financial outcome of the season has been promised but has not yet been given out; nevertheless, it is known that the receipts fell short of the expenses about 45,000 dollars, a mere bagatelle compared with the loss of last year, which gave Mr. Abbey a place in history alongside of Mr. Delafield and Baron Taylor. Nevertheless, the statement was received with surprise, for it is scarcely possible to conceive of more generous patronage than this operatic establishment received this year. The explanation was not difficult to the ceived this year. The explanation was not difficult to the knowing. In the first place, an effort was made to be sumptuous in the matter of stage decoration, and, of the twelve operas given, the scenery and costumes were on hand in the new house for only five. The salaries paid were not large compared with the demands made by artists like Madame Patti and Madame Nilsson, but there was something like liberality in the stage management, and the cost of the twenty-two representations averaged 3,400 dollars. The prices of admission had been lowered, so as to win the patronage of the large German population of New York, almost fifty per cent. from the prices of last year, and it required a remarkably fine house even to pay the cost of a representation. Though the season netted a loss of about the sum mentioned, therefore, the directors very wisely interpreted it to be a success, for many valuable "properties" had been added to the house, which will lessen the cost of future representations. Dr. Damrosch's death overthrew all the plans that had been made for next season. The directors were besieged by managers and musical conductors, who were anxious to fight the battle of German opera behind the generous bulwarks of the directors' fortunes. Anton Schott, the tenor, filled with an overweening sense of his own importance, submitted a proposition for next season before the memorial services were fairly concluded. The proposition in itself was not unreasonable, but it was hardly to be expected that the directors, who have not only the artistic reputation of their establishment but also their money at stake, would place at the head of affairs a singer who had shown his inability to agree with his fellow-artists. He proposed that Anton Seidl, of Bremen, husband of Madame Kraus, should be brought over next year as conductor, and that work should begin betimes to secure a strong company. Unfortunately for himself he coupled his proposition with statements in the public prints depreciatory of Madame Materna, Miss Nevada has helped to swell the enthusiasm with which Mr. Mapleson's company is greeted.

But to recur to the German opera and its fortunes. The himself disliked when he had hoped to make himself last week of the season was interrupted by the death of the trusted and admired. His proposition bore evidences, . FULL ANTHEM FOR FOUR VOICES

SIR R. P. STEWART,

PROFESSOR OF MUSIC IN THE UNIVERSITY OF DUBLIN.

Also published in Novello's Tonic Sol-fa Series, No. 304, price 1d.

moreover, that he had been trying to undermine Dr. Damrosch, who had befriended him, and with the tender feeling toward the dead man pervading all portions of the community, it was hardly to be wondered at that at the first opportunity that offered the patrons of the operatook occasion publicly to rebuke the conduct of the tenor and express their admiration for Madame Materna, whose acting and singing in "Die Walkure" had been an artistic revelation. The question what will be done next season is at present held in abeyance by the directors, who say, however, that they will adhere to their resolve to give German opera, and will not re-open their dalliance with the siren from Italy.

The death of their director has caused a postponement of the Concerts projected by the Oratorio and Symphony Societies, both of which promptly elected Walter Damrosch, a young man of twenty-three or twenty-four years, who has unmistakable talent, to succeed his father. Nevertheless the continued existence of the Symphony Society, after this season, can be regarded as problematical. A new project which has been placed on foot for next season by the friends of Mr. Theodore Thomas, will give us so many high-class Orchestral Concerts, that it would have been only with difficulty that Dr. Damrosch himself could have maintained his Symphony Concerts. The latter's post as Director of the Opera enabled him to improve the artistic character of his orchestra this year, by securing several of the best men from Mr. Thomas's forces, but the want of attention to the Symphony Concerts was noticeable in the work of the musicians. The prestige of the Society depended wholly upon Dr. Damrosch, and must naturally depart with him, the more since Mr. Thomas's project itself compasses the idea of a rival institution to the Philharmonic Society, which has been found in the past to be good in its influences upon our Concert Thomas will not lay down the conductor-Mr. ship of the Philharmonic Society, but, beginning with November 1, will give two Concerts of orchestral music a week, with a band of from sixty to eighty musicians, until May. One Concert will occur on Tuesday evening, the other on Thursday afternoon of each week. This project has grown out of a desire to enable Mr. Thomas to have a permanent orchestra always under his hand, and subject to no other influence than that With an which goes out from him and his artistic aims. extended series of Concerts in Brooklyn, and the regular series in neighbouring cities, these semi-weekly Concerts, which are to be called the Thomas Popular Concerts (it is in prospect that we will have "Tom Pops" to offset the London "Monday Pops,"), will give steady employment to Mr. Thomas's musicians and enable him to elevate the standard of excellence even above that of the Philharmonic Society.

The first-class Concerts of the season have been generously patronised, and have offered several interesting features. The production of "The Rose of Sharon" by the Chorus Society was postponed because of the tardy arrival of the orchestral parts from London (so it was announced), and will not take place until April. Last Saturday the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society performed Liszt's "Legend of St. Elizabeth," from Novello, Ewer and Co.'s edition, and achieved a most pronounced and distinguished success. Mr. Thomas conducted with clear-ness, firmness, and a most sympathetic interest in the music. The German Liederkranz had performed the work in the original tongue in 1870 and once afterward, and it had been heard in Cincinnati from a German society, but never before the Brooklyn Concert was it given in public in this country. It is included in the programme of the Cincinnati Musical Festival of 1886. Mr. Van der Stucken's Novelty Concerts have gained a firm hold on the public and the musicians, who admire the spirit which prompted their projection. At the last Concert he brought out four orchestral pieces, composed by local musicians (H. W. Nicholl, B. O. Klein, Ed. Heimendahl, and Otto Floersheim-the first is an Englishman long resident here, the last a pupil of Ferdinand Hiller, and editor of The Musical Courier, of this city). Mr. Van der Stucken's next scheme embraces none but American works, and it is expected that Mr. J. K. Paine, Mr. George E. Whiting, Mr. Dudley Buck, and other American composers will be on hand to conduct their own music.

MUSIC IN CANADA.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

In this, as in most young countries, music has been the last of the arts to take permanent root, and show signs of vigorous life. In our principal towns both the art and its votaries have passed through the usual vicissitudes; but it is now well established, and grows daily in public estima-tion. During our winter season we have frequent visits from travelling Concert troupes, including many of the greatest artists, both vocal and instrumental. These, however, though somewhat important to us, would hardly prove an interesting subject to your readers, inasmuch as their programmes are not striking, nor do they differ from those given by Concert companies throughout the world.

The musical public in England will probably be more interested in the efforts of our own local organisations, and to these I propose giving most prominence.

In Toronto there are two well-managed and successful societies, the Philharmonic under Mr. F. H. Torrington, and the Choral Society under Mr. E. Fisher. The former, which achieved the distinction of producing "The Redemption," almost immediately after its first performance in England, has this season given for the second time Costa's "Naaman," and is now practising Max Bruch's "Fair Ellen," and Niels Gade's "Crusaders." It has been working about twelve years under the same Conductor, and has a magnificent répertoire, including all the standard works. The Choral Society has been in existence about five years, and has attained a high position; it recently gave "Samson" as a celebration of the Handel bi-centenary. All the works produced by these societies are given with an excellent orchestra of about fifty players, partly local and partly engaged from the United States.

In Montreal the oldest established society is the Mendelssohn Choir, under Mr. J. Gould, a gifted amateur who, nearly twenty years ago, commenced work with a few friends in a private house. This society seldom performs works of magnitude, it makes a specialty of part-songs, which are rendered in an almost perfect manner. It numbers about 80 voices, and its performances are probably equal to those of any similar organisation on this Continent.

The Montreal Philharmonic, under Mons. G. Couture, has also a good record. It numbers nearly 300 members, and has this season given fine performances of Schumann's "Paradise and the Peri" and Handel's "Alexander's Feast," with soloists and part of the Orchestra (which numbered about 50) engaged from the States.

In Hamilton, the Philharmonic Society is under the conductorship of Mr. F. H. Torrington, and usually performs the same works as the Toronto Philharmonic.

Ottawa, the seat of Government and residence of the Governor-General, though a small town, boasts a good Philharmonic Society, under Mr. J. W. F. Harrison, num-bering about 100 voices. Its first Concert for the season consisted of Sterndale Bennett's "May Queen," with miscellaneous second part, and the Society is now at work on "Elijah" for the second Concert. Efforts have also been made from time to time in the direction of Chamber music, and this season a course of Concerts is being music, and this season a course of Concerts is being given in Toronto by Messrs. Jacobsen, Bayley, Martens and Kuhn. The programmes have so far included Haydn's Quartet, Op. 76, No. 3, Rubinstein's Quartet in F, Niels Gade's Piano Trio in F, played by Messrs. Kerison (piano), and Messrs. Bayley and Kuhn (violin'and violondado), and Messrs. Bayley and Kuhn (violin'and violondado). cello), and other important works. Ottawa too has a good string quartet, consisting of Messrs. Boucher, Reichling, Sarginson, and Brewer. This Club has given the first two of a series of four subscription Concerts. The most notable numbers on the programmes are Haydn's Quartets in D major, No. 35, and in C major, Beethoven's C minor, Rubinstein's F major, with two by Schubert in E flat major and G minor (Posth.). Ottawa is fortunate in possessing a resident virtuoso in the person of Mr. F. Boucher, who has performed at these Concerts Mendelssohn's E minor and Max Bruch's G minor Concertos, the Andante and Rondo Capriccioso of "Saint-Saëns," and Godard's A minor Concerto. Canada is also proud of having a nativeborn pianist of exceptional ability, Mr. Waugh Lander. This gentleman has performed in Europe and Canada a répertoire of such difficulty and extent as to place him in the front rank of virtuosi. He studied in Leipzig, and is, I believe, the only Canadian who can justly claim the honour of being a pupil of Liszt. He is at present settled in London, Ontario, where he presides over the musical department at Helmuth College. It is to be hoped that this field will not prove too restricted for him, and that Canada may retain the services of so gifted a musician.

MUSIC IN DARMSTADT.

SINCE my last letter a number of Concerts have taken place; and as music seems to draw near its end for this season, I will mention some of the most important events.

In the fourth Concert of the Grossherzoglig Hofmusik, we made the acquaintance of that admirable pianist, Frl. Flora Friedenthal, of Warsaw, who played Chopin's Concerto in E minor, and acquitted herself of her task in a highly creditable manner, the brilliancy of her execution. and the sensitiveness of her touch, reminding us forcibly of her celebrated countrywoman, Annette Essipoff. programme contained Mackenzie's Second Scotch Rhapsody ("Burns") which gave us another opportunity of admiring that composer's talent, and Saint-Saëns's "Danse Macabre," one of the most successful and attractive, but also fantastical productions of the French composer. Both pieces, as well as Beethoven's glorious Symphony in F major and Weber's Overture to "Oberon," were performed in really splendid style and warmly applauded.

A so-called "Elite-Concert," given by the Cuban violinvirtuoso, Brindis de Salas, in connection with Madame Mathilde Zimèri, from London, as vocalist, and Fräulein Therese Hennes, of Berlin, as pianist, in no respect merited that pompous designation. Brindis de Salas is certainly a violinist displaying eminent technical skill, but he is a virtuoso rather than an artist. The tone he produces from his instrument is devoid of power, yet his technical abilities are truly marvellous. The solos he played were, with the exception of the Adagio from Spohr's Ninth Concerto, mere claptrap, and call for no criticism. The vocal performances of Madame Zimèri I prefer covering with the veil of christian charity, but I must say that, with the remnants of a voice long since decayed, it appears strange that she should challenge public criticism. Fraulein Hennes, the talented daughter of the well-known professor of Berlin, found in compositions of Chopin, Schubert, and Liszt, ample opportunity to show a more than ordinary power of execution.

The third Soirée of Chamber-music brought two novelties; the first, a Quartet for strings in F major Op. 42, by Aug. Klughardt, did not generally realise the expectations which the first Allegro awakened. The second, a Trio for piano, violin, and violoncello in C major, Op. 87, by Brahms, is a production the charming Scherzo of which scarcely compensated for the tediousness, confusion and heaviness of the other three parts. The concluding number, Mozart's Quintet in G minor was received with unmixed pleasure, producing an effect like a refreshing shower after continued barrenness.

The fifth Concert of the Grossherzoglig Hofmusik opened with Rubinstein's powerful "Ocean-Sinfonie." There has already been so much written about this splendid work that it is needless to dwell on its merits. A piece for orchestra, of rather feeble character, "Pensée de Minuet," by E. Hartog, was favourably received," while the "Academische Festouverture," by Brahms, although capitally given, did not leave any impression upon the audience.

Handel's 200th birthday was celebrated by the Musikverein with an excellent performance of "Joshua," with Rietz's instrumentation.

The most important events at the Opera have been the appearances of the newly-discovered tenor star, Heinrich Bötel, in the rôles of Raoul ("Huguenots"), Manrico ("Trovatore"), and Chapelon ("Postillon de Lonjumeau"), and in W. de Haan's new opera, "Die Kaiserstochter." Regarding Bötel, I can only say that he is the happy possessor of a most magnificent voice, but that he is unripe as a vocalist. His intonation is faulty, his musical training is in its infancy, and his manner of singing lacks intelligence and taste, while his acting is that of a mere beginner.

It is really unpardonable on the part of his impresario, Pollini, to exact from him tasks which he (Bötel) is as vet unable to fulfil.

" Die Kaiserstochter" was a complete success. libretto, from the pen of W. Jacoby has, like so many others, its good and bad qualities. It treats of the legend of Eginhard and Emma, daughter of the Emperor Charlemagne, and though the verses are better than mere rhymes. the plot is rather paltry. The music, however, is the work of an accomplished musician, appealing to the understanding of the educated only, and making no concessions to the multitude. The ensembles and finales are of imposing power and energy, while the lyric movements breathe grace and tenderness. The instrumentation is truly masterly, and shows that de Haan has a natural facility for glowing and picturesque scoring, of which the beautiful introduc-tion to the third act, "Irrfahrt und Waldesfriede," gives ample proof. The work will no doubt make its way.

ampie probl. The work will be duch mass it way.

The réprise of Goetz's "Erzähmung der Widerspänstigen" ("Taming of the Shrew") proved a welcome addition to the répertoire. C. M. von Weber's "Sylvana," which in its new scenic attire, has proved so eminently successful at Hamburg, is destined to inaugurate our next opera-season.

JUDAS MACCABÆUS AT TURIN. (FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

HANDEL'S bi-centenary was celebrated at Turin, on the 1st ult., by a performance of "Judas Maccabæus," under the direction of Signor Roberti, who, by his successful execution of this Oratorio, has given ample proof of his ability as a conductor of choral music. He has made use of the experience acquired in the choral school, named after its founder, Stefano Tempia, of which this was the fifty-sixth Concert. Roberti has learning, capacity, and passion for his art, but he is unfortunately not sufficiently aided by the amateurs who form the Society, as they never appear in full numbers at any of the rehearsals or performances; it happens thus that an Oratorio loses its powerful effects, and can only be made effective by the perfection of the execution of the single parts. Fortunately the choice of "Judas" was most adapted to a public devoid of the phlegm and veneration of the English for such music. There is an attractive variety in it which leads the hearers, necessarily tired after the second part, to feel quite strung up and refreshed by the heroic chants, and war songs of the third part, with its final Alleluia, which, although not so famous as that in the "Messiah," is not less fine, and for its simplicity, perhaps, to be preferred to the former. I need not enumerate the pieces which gave most pleasure, nor enter into a detailed description of their beauties, as I have done for my Italian readers. They are too wellknown in England, and I could only repeat what others may have said often and better than myself. The execution, notwithstanding the scarcity in numbers of the performers, the absolute want of traditions, and the few rehearsals, was very commendable, and all its merit must be attributed to Signor Roberti, who infused, as it were, his own intelligence and passion into the performers. The basses and sopranos were, perhaps, too numerous for the altos and tenors, and the soloists (amateurs) had to contend with music filled with difficult passages and of a style unknown to us. Two of these amateurs, Signora Roberti, the conductor's daughter, and a young priest, Don Berrone, tenor, are worthy of special mention. Signora Roberti dedicates herself entirely to the study of classical music, which she sings with a purity and colouring not to be obtained by ordinary singers of modern cavatine.

Don Berrone, a fine young priest, full of ardour for music, had to suffer some disciplinary punishment from a former Bishop, who would not tolerate the liberty he took of appearing in public. The eminent prelate who now rules in Turin has no such prejudices, and our young Don has taken up music with more love than ever. He has a charming tenor voice, excellent accent, and a perfect pronunciation. Needless to say he was enthusiastically applauded for every piece he sang.

The hall was crowded. The Mayor of Turin and His Excellency Cardinal Alimonda were both present, and listened to "Judas," from the first to the last note, without giving signs of fatigue or impatience, as did all the hearers. No small compliment to pay to music more than a century old.

OBITUARY.

JAMES WILLIAM DAVISON .- We regret to announce the death of the eminent musical critic who, for nearly thirtyfive years, wielded in his particular sphere, the power of the Times newspaper. The sad event took place at the York Hotel, Margate, on the 24th ult., in presence of his two sons, and his devoted brother, Mr. W. Duncan Davison. It was not wholly unexpected, Mr. Davison having been a sufferer, more or less, for a considerable period. attack of illness set in about three weeks ago, and, although partial recovery took place, a relapse on the 21st ult. brought the fatal termination. The deceased gentleman was born in London in 1813, his father being a younger son of an ancient family long settled in Northumberland, and his mother the famous actress, Miss Duncan. For some time after attaining manhood, Mr. Davison settled to no particular pursuit, although both taste and talent pointed to a literary life. At last, however, he devoted himself to music, received lessons on the pianoforte from the still living Mr. W. H. Holmes; associated himself closely with Sterndale Bennett and George Macfarren, and became a composer, teacher, and occasional Concert-giver. Of his works, some among which were ambitious, his fine settings of Shelley's lyrics have survived to the present day, and will probably live on.
creation of its literature. He became a contributor to musical journals, and largely assisted the then critic of the Times, the late Mr. Charles Lamb Kenney; doing everything with so much force and brilliancy that his name soon became known. This led to a definite appointment on the Times, and to the requisition of his services by the Saturday Review, the Pall Mall Gazette, the Graphic and other papers, as well as the Musical World, which he edited for many long years.

Mr. Davison, whose love of his art was sincere and passionate, exercised a powerful influence throughout his career. He was a strong conservative, and could see little good in the new men and methods of our own day. On the other hand, no single person did more than he to familiarise our public with the classical Masters. To him we owe the idea of the Popular Concerts, and to his constant and enthusiastic advocacy is due much of the culture that has flowed from that enterprise. Several years prior to his death, Mr. Davison retired from active life. But he retained to the end the respect and affection of those who, having been admitted to his intimacy, knew his sterling worth.

MR. CARL Rosa announces that his season of English opera will commence at Drury Lane Theatre on Easter Monday, the 6th inst., and extend over eight weeks. The following novelties are promised: — "Nadeshda," a Romantic Opera, written expressly for the company by Goring Thomas, the principal parts being sustained by Madame Valleria and Mr. Barton McGuckin; Massenet's Opera "Manon" (English version by Joseph Bennett), with Madame Marie Roze and Mr. Joseph Maas in the prominent characters; and Boïto's "Mefistofele" (first time in English in London), Margaret and Helen of Troy, Madame Marie Roze; Faust, Mr. McGuckin, and Mefistofele, Mr. Ludwig; Mozatt's "Marriage of Figaro" is to be revived, the Countess, Madame Georgina Burns; Susanna, Madame Marie Roze: Cherubino, Madame Valleria; Count Almaviva, Mr. Ludwig, and Figaro, Mr. Barrington Foote. Selections will be made from an extensive réfertoire of works which have already been performed by the Carl Rosa Company. In addition to the vocalists named the list includes Madame Julia Gaylord, Miss Clara Perry, Miss Josephine Yorke, Miss Marion Burton, Messrs. B. Wilson, Charles Lyall, B. Davies, Sauvage, Walter Clifford, G. H. Snazelle, and Crotty. The Conductors are Mr. Alberto Randegger and Mr. E. Goossens, and the valuable services of Mr. Augustus Harris are secured for the miss-en-scène.

Herr Hermann Franke has issued an appeal to the lovers of German Opera in England for a Guarantee Fund, in order to reduce the risk of loss which might attend the giving of six performances of Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde" in June, or the first week in July, of the present year. It is intended that these representations shall take place in the following manner:—Tuesday, Thursday, Saturday, Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday. This would be only one day more than a week, but would leave some days open as a break, which is thought to be desirable. It is stated that the artists will be of the highest order; the work will be given without any cuts, and there is to be a double company of vocalists, who will sustain the principal parts alternately. The guarantors are already so numerous as to justify the hope that the scheme can be carried out.

At a meeting held in the Royal Academy of Music on February 28, it was resolved that a Scholarship in memory of the eminent vocalist, Madame Sainton-Dolby, who entered as a student of the Institution in 1834, and was elected King's Scholar in 1837, be forthwith endowed in the Academy; and that, in furtherance of this object, a subscription list be opened at the Bank of Messrs. Coutts and Co., and at the London and County Bank, Hanover Square. We have much pleasure in saying that the response to this appeal has already been most liberal; and the names of the donors sufficiently evidence how widely spread is the respect for the accomplished artist and amiable woman who has passed from amongst us.

The prospectus of the Richter Concerts promises nine evening performances during the present season, commencing on the 27th inst., at St. James's Hall, under the directorship of Herr Hermann Franke; Leader, Herr Ernst Schiever; Choir Director, Herr Theodor Frantzen, and Conductor, Herr Hans Richter. There will be an orchestra of 100 performers, and the Richter Chorus. The programmes will include the following works:—Beethoven: Overtures, Op. 115, and "König Stefan"; Symphonies, Nos. 2, 3, 4, 5, 7, and 9; "Meeresstille und Glückliche Fahrt "(orchestra and chorus); Berlioz: Overture, "Benvenut Cellini"; Symphony, "Funèbre et Triomphale"; Brahms: "Academische Ouverture"; Rhapsodie (orchestra and chorus, with alto solo); Dvorák: Overture "Mein Heim"; Glinka; "Kamarinskaja"; Haydn: Symphony in C; Liszt: Rhapsodie, No. 5 (first time), "Mephisto Walzer," and selection from "Christus"; Mendelssohn: Overture, "Hebrides"; Mozart: Symphony in E flat; Schubert: Symphony in B minor; Schumann: Overture "Manfred"; Stanford: "Elegiac Ode" (solo, chorus, and orchestra); Weber: Overture, "Oberon"; and Wagner: Overtures, "Der Fliegende Holländer" and "Die Meistersinger," with selections from "Walküre," "Die Meistersinger," and "Nibelungen Ring." The names of the vocalists and solo instrumentalists will be shortly announced.

A SUCCESSFUL Concert was given by Mr. H. F. Gregg on the 5th ult., in the Alston Road School Room before a crowded audience. The first part opened with Haydn's Overture "Orlando Paladino," played by Miss and Mr. Gregg, and Mr. Clare Foy performed several pieces on the Zither, which were redemanded. Amongst the vocalists Miss Hay was much applauded for her rendering of Blumenthal's song "Across the far blue hills, Marie"; the same lady also giving Cowen's "The children's home with considerable effect. Mr. Gregg chose for his solos, Schumann's Scherzino, Op. 26, from the "Fashingsschwank," one of Mendelssohn's Lieder ohne Worte, and Chopin's Etude in A flat, Op. 25, No. 1, all of which were most favourably received. Recitations were likewise delivered by Messrs. H. J. Cooper and H. P. Stock.

A VERY successful Organ Recital was given on the 16th ult, in Christ Church, Chalton Street, Somers Town, N.W., by Mr. Samuel Moore, the Organist of the Church. The Recital, which commenced with a short service, comprised Eaptismal Song (Meyerbeer), Postlude in C (H. Harford Battley), "Angels ever bright and fair" (Handel), Prelude and Fugue in C minor (J. S. Bach), Air with Variations from the Symphony in D (Haydn), and Grand Offertoire in F (Wély). Two anthems were well sung by the choir, and the tenor solo, "Be thou faithful unto death" ("St. Paul"), was given with much effect by Mr. G. Gostic.

In Mr. A. Victor Benham, at his Pianoforte Recital (the second of the present season), given at Steinway Hall, on the 24th ult., we made the acquaintance of a young artist who, notwithstanding the ample existing and prospective supply of gifted performers on his instrument in this country, is likely to come to the fore in due course. For the present, however, the appreciation implied by this remark must be subjected to a considerable admixture of the proverbial "grain of salt." Mr. Benham's mechanism the proverbial "grain of sait." Mr. Bennam's mechanism is, as yet, far from perfect, his phrasing is frequently indistinct and, at times, absolutely faulty, as exemplified in Beethoven's "Waldstein" sonata, and the "Davidsbundler" series by Schumann; shortcomings which more mature artists have, however, before now made us forget by the poetic feeling pervading their interpretation. In the latter attribute, too, the present performer is still somewhat deficient. On the other hand, Mr. Benham's playing is characterised by a boldness of attack and an unaffected impetuosity of spirit in dealing with the greatest difficulties of execution, which indicate the presence of more than ordinary talent. A feature in the young pianist's performance was the "improvisation of a sonata," for which purpose themes for three movements were handed to him, by request, from members of the audience. We need scarcely say that the result of Mr. Benham's improvisation on the themes he selected bore about as much resemblance to a "sonata" as, say, the attitudes displayed by a performer on the tight rope may be said to resemble those exhibited in the plastic figures of classical Greek art. A sonata, need it be said, represents a distinct musical organism, constructed upon a well thought-out plan, and harmonious in all its parts; and the attempt to extemporise in this art-form is a childish one. The young artist, however, displayed considerable individual resource, both imaginative and mechanical, in his free fantasia on the themes given, while in this, as in several other respects, his talent, as yet, lacks the necessary discipline, there can be little doubt that, with some additional training, Mr. Benham may in time assume a prominent position in the profession.

THE sixth annual Report of the Orphan School and Benevolent Fund for the Daughters of Musicians, under the management of Miss Helen Kenway, shows that the Institution is rapidly gaining sympathy and support, although earnest aid is still solicited in order to carry on the work with the necessary energy. It is essential to apprise all who are desirous of benefiting this excellent Charity that poverty, and not talent, is the plea for admission to the school. Pupils who possess musical talent will of course be assisted to prepare for the profession; but those who have no special qualification for music will be trained to support themselves in some other way. The agreement for the house now occupied by the school is out in June next, but the landlord has offered to sell the lease for about £600. These premises, situated in Darnley Road, Royal Crescent, Notting Hill, are eminently suited for the purpose; and if one or more persons could be found to contribute the sum named, the school could be carried on without the incubus of rent. The house would be vested in trustees, and if any musician would volunteer to share the duties of this office with Mr. W. H. Cummings, who has generously offered to act in this capacity, and also to give a donation towards the purchase of the house, he would greatly help forward the good cause.

A PROSPECTUS of the "Musical Exchange," Limited (the Managing Director of which is Mr. Henry Mapleson), has been forwarded to us, accompanied by a letter stating that the shares of the Company have already been fully subscribed for. The Association has been formed for the direction and transaction of all business relating to or connected with Music and the Drama at home and abroad. "International artistic intercourse," it is said, "will be promoted in every way, with a view to protecting copyright, and further extending and developing the field for the successful exercise of the musical and dramatic professions." Special features of the undertaking will be the negotiation of engagements, the provision of musical companies, vocal and instrumental, the responsible management of concerts, &c., and there are to be Subscription and Reading Rooms. The registered offices are at 26, Old Bond Street.

The Stanningley and District Sunday School Union's Whitsuntide Prize Tune Contest, which has been held now for several years, is beginning to be looked forward to with very great interest, not only by musicians but by Sunday-school teachers throughout the kingdom. The Union has adopted the same plan this year as on previous occasions—viz., throwing open the competition of Great Britain and Ireland; and altogether nineteen compositions have been received. The adjudicator (Mr. Samuel Wilson, A.C.) reports upon all the pieces sent in that they are very much superior in composition to former years, and great care has had to be exercised in going through the various pieces. The highest number of marks obtainable was sixty. The first prize is awarded to Mr. T. H. Salter, of Bradford, who obtains fifty-three marks; the second to Mr. Benjamin Walker, of Hunslet, Leeds, with fifty marks; and the third to Mr. Wm. Scott, of Bowling, Bradford, with forty-eight marks. The Committee is perfectly satisfied with the report as given by the adjudicator, and well pleased with the attention he has bestowed upon the compositions. It is expected that copies of the tunes will be ready about Easter.

THE Finsbury Choral Association gave a Concert on the 26th ult., at Holloway Hall, when Dr. Stainer's "Daughter of Jairus" and Mendelssohn's "Athalie" were performed. The choir, numbering 200 voices, sang with great spirit and precision, and elicited the hearty approval of Dr. Stainer, who conducted his own work. The solo vocalists in the "Daughter of Jairus" were Miss Annie Marriott, Mr. Alfred Kenningham, and Mr. T. Kempton, the two first-named being warmly encored in the charming duet "Love Divine." In Mendelssohn's "Athalie" the soloists were Miss Annie Marriott, whose power of dramatic expression admirably fits her for this music, and who sang with remarkable earnestness, Miss Edith Marriott, and Madame Florence Winn. Mr. Charles Fry recited the illustrative verses, and his rendering of the long accompanied recitation "Earth, lend an ear," evoked loud applause. The Conductor of the Society, Mr. C. J. Dale, efficiently conducted the "Athalie" music, and the accompaniments were played throughout by Mr. J. P. Harding (piano), and Mr. Marchment (harmonium).

THE Centennial Services at St. Luke's Parish Church, Old Street, in aid of the funds of the Finsbury Dispensary, will be held on Sunday the 19th inst. In the morning the music will be entirely selected from the works of Mozart, and in the evening from those of Handel. Before the morning service "Recordare, Jesu pie" (Requiem), and "Andante" (Quartet in D minor); and after the service, "Gloria" (12th Mass), and "Cum sancto spiritu," (13th Mass), will be performed on the organ. At Evening Prayer the instrumental pieces chosen for performance before the service are "Angels ever bright and fair" ("Theodora"), and "Waft her, Angels" ("Jephtha"); and after the service, Overture, "Occasional Oratorio," "Rejoice greatly," ("Messish"), and Coronation Anthem ("Zadok the Priest"). The Anthem at the Evening service is the "Hallelujah Chorus" ("Messish"). The whole of the music for the Paalms, &c., judiciously chosen from the composers named, has been arranged and adapted, by desire, by Dr. C. W. Pearce, F.C.O.

The St. George's Glee Union, conducted by Mr. Joseph Monday, gave its 194th monthly Concert on Friday, the 6th ult., at the Pimlico Rooms. The feature of the evening was Sir Sterndale Bennett's sacred Cantata "The Woman of Samaria," which was rendered throughout in a most praiseworthy manner. The solo artists were Miss Edith Stowe, Madame Osborne Williams, Mr. Edward Dalzell, and Mr. Thurley Beale. The choruses, especially "Therefore with joy," and "Therefore they shall come and sing," were admirably given by the choir, about seventy voices. The Cantata was preceded by a short miscellaneous first part, in which the choir gave "Cry aloud and shout" (Croft) and "Praise the Lord, O my soul" (Goss); Mr. Thurley Beale, "Honour and arms" (Samson); and Madame Osborne Williams, "There is a green hill" (Goundo). Mr. F. R. Kinkee presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. H. King at the harmonium.

THE Metropolitan Choral and Orchestral Union in connection with "The People's Entertainment Society gave a Concert at the Bermondsey Town Hall on Wednesday, the 4th ult. This Institution has branches in Bermondsey, Rotherhithe, Battersea, and Poplar, and these met together on this occasion to perform a selection from Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," the choral rendering of which would compare most favourably with almost any existing choir. The orchestra was occasionally scarcely happy in its attack, but this defect was soon checked by the precision exhibited on the part of the members of the choir. It was the first Concert given on such a large scale by the Metropolitan Choral Union, and as the result was so successful we may reasonably hope for a speedy repetition. Lady Folkestone sang as she always does, most artistically, the Hon. Spencer Lyttelton and Mr. T. W. Hanson in the bass and tenor parts respectively, being also highly efficient. In the second part, which was miscellaneous, Mr. W. Warner Hollis deserves special mention for his admirable flute solo. Mr. W. H. Leslie conducted.

We have on a previous occasion called the attention of our readers to the honourable career of a young English pianist, Miss Alice Menzies, at the Leipzig Conservatoire. We now have the pleasure of adding that she has won fresh laurels by her admirable rendering of Schumann's "Etudes symphoniques," at a Concert given in the splendid new hall of the Gewandhaus on the 8th ult., on behalf of the building-fund for the English church. The local critics were evidently surprised at the selection of so difficult a piece by so young a performer; but all speak in such glowing terms of her admirable execution that her tutors, Herr Zwintscher and Herr Reinecke, must be highly gratified. She received at the close of her performance two hearty recalls. The other portions of the programme included several orchestral pieces excellently played by the fine band of the Institute, and also a Violin Concerto performed by Herr Ottoker Novaçek, a Hungarian violinist of high promise. Miss Alice Menzies intends to remain in Leipzig for another year.

On Wednesday, the 4th ult, a Concert was given at Eccleston Square Church, Belgrave Road, in aid of the Choir Funds. The soloists were Miss K. Winifred Payne, Mr. W. Mackway, and Mr. Frank May. The church choir, increased to seventy voices, rendered in a very satisfactory manner several choruses, amongst them being "Hallelujah" ("Mount of Olives"), Mendelssohn's "Hear my prayer," "Worthy is the Lamb," and "Amen" ("Messiah"), and a unison anthem composed by the Organist of the Church, Mr. Rowland Briant, F.C.O., under whose direction the musical arrangements were carried out. Miss Payne sang Mendelssohn's "I will sing of Thy great mercies," the solo music in "Hear my prayer," and Gounod's "Ave Verum" with much success; Mr. Mackway gave some selections from "The Messiah," and Sir W. Sterndale Bennett's "His salvation is nigh them," and Mr. May won the warmest applause for his rendering of "Arm, arm, ye brave," and "Why do the nations." Mr. A. Lake and Mr. R. Steggall efficiently presided at the organ during the evening.

Ar St. John's Chapel, Trinity Parish', New York, Mendelssohn's Oratorio "Christus" was given for the anthem, on Sunday evening, the 1st ult., at the regular monthly Choral Festival Service. The musical programme included Mann's Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, Lord's Prayer and Nicene Creed by Le Jeune, and hymn, "When I survey the wondrous Cross" (Smart), sung by the congregation and choir, alternate verses. The soloists were Mr. Whitney Mockridge, Mr. Edward Connell, Mr. T. M. Greenhalgh, and Masters George Chapman and Felix Wendelschaefer, with a chorus of thirty-five men and boys, under the direction of Mr. George F. Le Jeune, Organist, &c. The Rev. Sullivan Weston, D.D., Rectorin Charge, presided.

The Members of the Old Gravel Pit Choral Society, Hackney, gave a very good performance of Dr. Stainer's "St. Mary Magdalen," on Monday evening, the 9th ult., the principal vocalists being Madame Clara West, Miss Rose Dafforne, R.A.M., Mr. Frederick Williams, and Mr. Henry Prenton; pianoforte, Miss M. Frost; harmonium, Mr. L. B. Prout, R.A.M. Mr. C. M. Cox conducted.

THE second of the series of three Subscription Chamber Concerts, organised by Messrs. Walter Mackway and Charles Stewart Macpherson, took place at the Brixton Hall, on the 3rd ult. The programme, which consisted of works composed between 1820 and the present time, comprised—Quintet in E flat, Op 44, for pianoforte, two violins, viola, and violoncello (Schumann); Trio in D minor, Op, 49, for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello (Mendelssoh); Quartet in A minor, Op. 51, No. 2, for two violins, viola, and violoncello (Brahms); pianoforte solos by Chopin and Sterndale Bennett; songs by Franz, Rubinstein and Dvorák; and a Serenade for tenor voice, with French horn Dbbligato (C. S. Macpherson). The artists were—first violin, Mr. Francis Ralph; second violin, Mr. Lewis Hann; viola, Mr. W. H. Hann; violoncello, Mr. W. C. Hann; French horn, Mr. C. F. E. Catchpole; pianoforte, Miss Margaret Gyde; vocalist, Mr. Walter Mackway; accompanists, Mr. Alfred Izard and Mr. C. S. Macpherson. The Concert was highly successful, and there was a very good audience.

MR. GEAUSSENT announces his Benefit Concert at St. James's Hall on Wednesday evening, May 13, in connection with his well-known choir. The programme will be of exceptional interest, including A. C. Mackenzie's dramatic Cantata "Jason"—the composer having written a new Scena expressly for Mr. Lloyd, which will be performed for the first time on this occasion; a Patriotic Hymn, by Antonin Dvorák (first time of performance)—which it is hoped the composer will conduct—and the Finale to the unfinished Opera "Loreley" (Mendelssohn), the soprano solo in which will be sung by Madame Albani, who, with Messrs. E. Lloyd and Santley, will be the principal vocalists of the evening. There will be a band and chorus of three hundred performers; leader, Mr. J. T. Carrodus, Mr. Geaussent will conduct. We can scarcely doubt that so powerful an attraction will command a large audience.

The members of the Grosvenor Choral Society gave their 157th monthly Concert at the Grosvenor Hall, on Friday, the 20th ult. The programme consisted of a miscellaneous selection of sacred music, including Weber's Jubilee Cantata, "The Praise of Jehovah," "Hear my Prayer" (Mendelssohn), anthem, "Praise the Lord, O my soul" (Marcellus Higgs), "How lovely are the messengers" (Mendelssohn), and Halleujah Chorus (Beethoven). The soloists were Miss E. Phillips, Miss Louise Bond, Miss Annie Layton, Mr. T. P. Frame, Mr. A. J. Reynolds, Mr. A. Roach, and Mr. J. Donnell Bafle. Mrs. T. P. Frame and Mr. George Winny ably presided at the pianoforte and harmonium respectively, and Mr. David Woodhouse conducted with his usual ability. The soloists were very successful and the choruses were rendered with much precision.

The monthly Smoking Concert of the Victoria Glee Club (which was designated "Patriotic," all the music rendered having a patriotic or martial spirit) was held under the direction of Mr. W. Sexton, at the Victoria Mansions Restaurant, Victoria Street, S.W., on Saturday, the 21st ult. The programme comprised "Who's for the Queen" (Davis), "The Beleaguered" (Sullivan), "I wish to tune my quivering Jyre" (Walmisley), "Glory and Love" (Gounod), "Comrades in Arms" (Adam), and "Hark, the merry drum" (Krugh). Solos, duets, and songs were rendered by Messrs. W. Sexton, F. Bevan, E. Branscombe, S. Kessell, C. R. Bayley, J. W. Sanderson, and F. Swinford, and Mr. Williams gave a concertina solo. The accompanists were Messrs. James Hallé and Frank Swinford.

A PERFORMANCE of "Judas Maccabæus," commemorative of the Birth of Handel, was given by the South London Choral Association at the Institute of Music, Camberwell, on Tuesday, February 24. The choral singing deserved the highest praise, and was characterised by much precision. The solo vocalists were Miss Ellen Atkins, Miss Kate Norman, Miss Josephine Cravino, Mr. Dyved Lewys, and Mr. Stanley Smith. The accompaniments reflected credit upon the amateur orchestra connected with the Institute, and Mr. Leonard C. Venables discharged the duties of Conductor with care and ability. The hall was crowded with an enthusiastic audience.

The Daily News says that a missing string quartet in G, by the late Sir Sterndale Bennett, has just been discovered at Brighton by his enthusiastic pupil, Mr. Thomas Wingham, of the Royal Academy of Music. The quartet, which is in Sterndale Bennett's autograph, is in parts, that for the viola, which was evidently written last, bearing date October 15, 1831. At that time Bennett was only fifteen, and had been for five years a student at the Royal Academy of Music. The quartet was rehearsed at the Academy in 1831, but never performed. Bennett handed the parts to his fellow-student, Mr. John Gledhill, of Brighton, in whose possession they have since remained. The quartet, which will shortly be performed at one of the musical afternoons held at the Brompton Oratory, consists of four movements—viz., Allegro moderato, Adagio, Allegro (minuetto), and Allegro finale.

THE following is the form of Statute recently passed by Convocation relating to the admission of women to the first Examination for the degree of Mus. Bac, at Oxford University:-" Whereas it is expedient to provide that the Delegates of Local Examinations shall use the First Examination for the Degree of Bachelor of Music for the Oxford University Examination for Women, the University enacts as follows:-The Delegates shall also make arrangements for using for the purposes of this subsection the first Examination for the degree of Bachelor in Music, and the Examiners in Music shall carry out such arrangements. No Candidate shall be allowed to offer herself for examination under this clause who has not passed some Examination which is in the judgment of the Delegates equivalent to Responsions. The Delegates shall from time to time publish a list of such Examinations."

A PERFORMANCE of Haydn's "Creation" was given at Chelsea Congregational Church, on the 12th ult., under the direction of the Organist, Mrs. A. J. Layton, F.C.O. The choir numbered over 100 voices, and the accompaniments were played by a string band, the wind parts being given on the organ by Mrs. Layton. The choruses, under the conductorship of Mr. H. A. Evans, were sung throughout with steadiness and expression, "The Heavens'are telling" and "Achieved is the glorious work" being exceptionally well rendered. The soloists were Madame Minnie Gwynne, Mr. Alfred Rudland, and Mr. A. J. Layton. The performance was in aid of the Organ Fund, the present instrument, by Bishop, possessing only two manuals and a tenor C swell. It is proposed to complete the swell, and to add a choir organ, with other minor improvements.

On Thursday, the 5th ult., a miscellaneous Concert was given at the Victoria Hall, Waterloo Road, under the direction of Mrs. A. J. Layton, F.C.O. Several part-songs, including "The Song of the Vikings" and Churchill Sibley's new Choral March, "The Black Prince," conducted by the composer, were well sung by a choir of forty voices. Ballads were contributed by Mdme. Minnie Gwynne, and Miss Annie Layton, the latter lady receiving hearty recalls for her solos and duets with Mr. Alfred J. Layton. The other vocalists were Mr. W. J. Dyer, Dr. Cooper Key, and the Rev. Arthur Vesey, the latter gentlemen playing two flute duets. Pianoforte selections from Chopin and Schumann were performed by Mr. Charles E. Clemens. Mrs. Layton accompanied.

On Sunday evening, the 15th ult., a selection from "The Messiah," comprising the Passion Music, was given at the Royal Military (Guards') Chapel, Wellington Barracks, under the direction of Mr. Richard Lemaire, the Precentor of the Chapel. There was a complete orchestra, and the choir, augmented for the occasion, gave the choruses most efficiently. The solos, too, were admirably rendered. This service was the fourth of the series of special musical services announced to be given under Mr. Lemaire's direction. The spacious chapel was crowded in every part, and hundreds of persons were unable to obtain admission.

A SUCCESSFUL Concert was given by Mr. Alfred Rudland, at the Bolingbroke Hall, Clapham Junction, on the 23rd ult. The programme was miscellaneous and of a popular character. The vocalists were Madame Adelina Paget, Miss Pauline Featherby, Mr. A. Rudland, Mr. T. Moncrieff, Mr. A. Owen, Mr. J. Kift, and Mr. B. Thelenberg; Miss Matilda Crimp (pianoforte), Mr. Otto Muscat (cornet).

We learn with regret that, after an existence of seven seasons, the Denmark Hill Concerts are to be no longer given, in consequence of the inadequate support which has been accorded to the later series. That the loss of these high class performances will be very keenly felt by a certain section of local amateurs we are confident; and it is a matter for some surprise that a district notable for its interest in music should suffer Concerts of so excellent a character to fall through for want of patronage. Amongst other executants the following eminent artists have played at these Concerts: Madame Norman-Néruda, MM. Joachim, Straus, L. Ries, Zerbini, Piatti, and Hausmann; Mdlles. Janotha, Marie Krebs, Agnes Zimmermann, and Mr. Charles Hallé.

THE Kyrle Choir, under the direction of Mr. Malcolm Lawson, have recently given performances as follows—"Samson" in Trinity Chapel, Poplar, on February 25, when the soloists were Miss von Hennig, Miss Howell, Mr. Henry Yates, Mr. Horace Stuart, and Mr. Pelham Rooff. Mr. E. H. Turpin accompanied on the organ. Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer," a selection from Mozart's "Requiem," and Spohr's "Last Judgment," in St. Saviour's Chapel, Poplar, on the 4th ult., and in St. Mark's, Walworth, on the 11th ult. At the first performance the soloists were Miss Alice Fripp, Mrs. Dean, Mr. Reginald Groome, and Mr. Jabez West; and at the second, Miss Edith Phillips, Miss Clotilde Kapff, Mr. John Probert, and Mr. Jabez West.

A PERFORMANCE of Mendelssohn's "Elijah" was given at the Lecture Hall, East Finchley, on Tuesday, February 24, by the East Finchley Choral Society, assisted by a contingent of vocalists from North Finchley. The solo portions were well rendered by Miss Margaret Hoare, R.A.M., Miss Edith Kelly, Mr. Orlando Harley, and Mr. W. G. Forington, Miss Katie Cox sang the passages assigned to the "Youth." The Choir, which consisted of about sixty voices, rendered the choruses most satisfactorily, Mr. Greenslade conducted, and the accompaniments were played by Miss Janes (Pianoforte) and Mr. Edwin Drewett, A.C.O. (Harmonium).

THE Marlborough Choral Society gave its seventh Concert of the present season on Tuesday, the roth ult., at St. Peter's Hall, Chelsea, when Farmer's Oratorio "Christ and His Soldiers" was well rendered, under the direction of Mr. T. R. Macrow. The solos were efficiently sung by Miss Jessie Sims, Miss A. Piffin, Mr. W. Powell, and Mr. J. Catten. Miss Rose Williams and Mr. George Sothern presided at the pianoforte and American organ respectively. The Society will take part in the Choral Competition at the Inventions Exhibition in August next.

A CONCERT, in aid of the Widows and Orphans Fund of the Metropolitan Fire Brigade, was given at the Steinway Hall, on the 19th ult., by the London Orchestral Society. In addition to the pieces by the orchestra, instrumental solos were given by Miss M. Bolton (violin), Messrs. F. Halls (flute), J. Gardiner (cornet), and Herr K. Schüller (piano). The vocalists were Miss Agnes Larkcom and Mr. Ernest A. Williams, both of whom received encores. Mr. T. Herbert Wilkins was an able Conductor.

An interesting Concert was given in the Lecture Hall of Ladbroke Grove Chapel, Notting Hill, on Thursday evening, February 26, in aid of the Building Fund. Gratuitous services were rendered by Madame Evans-Warwick, Mr. Haydn Grover, Mr. D. Curtis, and Mr. Frederick Thorpe. Master Felix Lochner, only ten years of age, performed two violin solos with commendable precision, his father, Mr. Russell Lochner, playing the pianoforte part and also accompanying the vocalists. The Concert concluded with a male voice part-song.

An excellent performance of Sir George Macfarren's Cantata "The Lady of the Lake" was given on Wednesday, February 25, by the Herne Hill Choral Society. The choral singing reflected great credit on the Society, and the solos were well rendered by Miss Amy Aylward, Miss Hughes, Miss Alice Farren, Mr. Greenwood, Mr. Theodore Distin, and Mr. J. T. Hutchinson. Mr. Arthur Clait presided at the pianoforte and Mr. Walter Stark at the organ. Mr. Windeyer Clark conducted with care and ability.

HERR EMIL MAHR gave a Violin Recital at the Steinway Hall, on Monday afternoon, the 16th ult. The player is an excellent executant, possessing a fine tone and a broad expressive style. The most important works in his programme were Spohr's Scena Cantante, and Schubert's Rondo Brillante in B minor, in which he was joined by Herr Carl Weber. He also introduced a paraphrase from his own pen of the "Charfreitag's Zauber," from Wagner's "Parsifal." Madame Sophie Lowe, Miss Lena Little, and Miss A. Jenoure contributed some songs and duets.

On Tuesday the 24th ult., a Concert was given at the Brompton Hospital, under the conductorship of Mr. Lindsay Sloper, assisted by Miss Alice Roselli, Miss Clara Dowle, Miss Fanny Moody, Miss Minnie Kirton, Signor Ernesto Valmeiri, and Mr. J. W. Thompson, vocalists. Miss Churchill, Miss A. Churchill, Miss Gertrude Swepstone, Miss Adela Duckham and Miss Newson gave selections on the pianoforte, and Miss Adela Duckham performed on the violin. The programme was a good one and very successfully carried out.

An excellent and highly successful Concert was given in the Council Chamber, Westminster Town Hall, by the employés of Messrs. John Broadwood and Sons, and members of their families, on the 6th ult. This being the first public appearance, as a stringed orchestra, of the Broadwood Band, the event was naturally looked forward to with much interest, and we are glad to record that in every respect the rendering of all the pieces reflected the utmost credit upon all concerned. The programme was well selected and varied.

SIR W. STERNDALE BENNETT'S "Woman of Samaria" was given at the Gresham Hall, Brixton, on Monday evening the 2nd ult., by the members of the Brixton Vocal Union. The soloists were Miss Mary Beare, R.A.M., Miss Annie Buckland, Mr. F. Walter Crawley, and Mr. Theo. Moss, R.A.M. Mr. Arthur J. Crabb presided at the organ, and Mr. T. Waldo Morell conducted. The choir and orchestra numbered over 100.

An Organ Recital was given in All Saints' Church, South Acton, on the evening of Thursday, February 26, by Miss M. Beauchamp, and Mr. E. H. Sugg, L.A.M., Organist of St. Mary, Acton. Besides an Organ Duet, each performer contributed five pieces. Miss Beauchamp's solos included Bach's Fugue in G minor, and Mr. Sugg's selection the same composer's "Giant Fugue.

On the 17th inst. a Festal Service will be held at All Saints Church, Kensington Park, W. at 8 p.m., when Dr. Bridge, Organist of Westminster Abbey, has kindly consented to play his "Hymn to the Creator," which will be sung by the choir of the Church, augmented for the occas-Mr. E. H. Birch, Mus. Bac. Oxon., will conduct.

MR. WALTER CLIFFORD, favourably known as a baritone vocalist, principally on the concert stage, will make his first appearance with the Carl Rosa Opera Company, as Brètigny, in Massenet's successful opera, "Manon," on its first production in London, at Drury Lane Theatre.

MR. JULIAN ADAMS, whose Orchestral Concerts have created so much effect at several of the health resorts of England, announces a seventh series at Eastbourne from June to October, in the Devonshire Park.

Mr. C. E. MILLER'S Thursday Organ Recitals at St. Augustine and St. Faith's Church, Watling Street, which have been well attended during the past month, will be continued to the end of April, at the same hour (1.15).

THE Civil Service Vocal Union's third and final Smoking Concert of the season was held at the Freemasons' Tavern, Great Queen Street, on Thursday evening, the 5th ult., Mr. J. H. Maunder conducted.

MR. W. S. HOYTE has accepted an engagement to give Organ Recitals at the Alexandra Palace on Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays, from six to seven, during the forthcoming Exhibition,

THE dates of the forthcoming Bristol Festival are fixed for October 20, 21, 22, and 23.

REVIEWS.

Sonata in B minor. For piano and violin. Composed by B. Luard Selby. Op. 21. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE number of important instrumental works produced by the younger generation of English musicians is healthy sign of the present condition of the art in this country. In the large majority of cases the composer can have but little expectation of any adequate remuneration for the labour expended in the production of a quartet or a sonata; the pleasure arising from the act of composition, and the appreciation of a select few are too often the only rewards obtained; but it is satisfactory to find many earnest workers who devote themselves to art for its own sake in preference to inundating the counters of our music warehouses with " pot boilers."

These remarks have been suggested by the examination of Mr. Selby's new sonata, a work written by a musician for musicians. The composer has in his forms adhered mostly to the lines laid down by the great masters-a course for which we should be the last to find fault with him. Judging him by the present work, we are disposed to class him with the conservative rather than with the progressive school. In saying this we mean that we find not the slightest trace in his music of the influence of Schumann. Mr. Selby's model appears to be Mendelssohn. In the first subject of the opening allegro, and perhaps even more in that of the finale, there is a distinctly Mendelssohnian tinge, though without direct plagiarism. In the slow movement, which we consider the best of the three, we see more individuality of style, though here also the composer's predilection for his favourite writer shows itself occasionally.

The opening movement (Allegro con brio), commences with a broad and clearly defined melody allotted to the violin, the continuations of which lead in due course to the second subject, the flowing character of which is well contrasted with that of the opening. Mr. Selby has here adopted a plan not incapable of justification on theoretical grounds, but of which we nevertheless venture to doubt the expediency. He introduces his second subject in the relative major of the original key, but instead of concluding his exposition in that same key (D major), the continuation of the subject is in F sharp minor. Precedent may be easily found for either the relative major or the dominant minor as the key of a second subject; but the combination of the two is unusual, and to our mind tends to disturb the unity of the work. After a cleverly worked "free fantasia," the subjects are repeated in a condensed form, the first part of the second subject now appearing in B minor, while the section of it which was in F sharp minor does not recur at all. A short coda, ending with a few bars of the first subject, lento and piano, concludes the movement.

The interesting Adagio (in D major, 3-4 time), is written in the "ternary form." The principal subject is well conceived, being as simple in design as it is effective in performance. The melody, like many of Beethoven's noblest (as for instance the theme of the slow movement of the B flat trio), consists mostly of conjunct intervals, and is harmonised in a manner which shows how much may be done by the skilful use of simple progressions. The middle section of the movement is more passionate, with abundance of broken chords for the piano. A "Quasi-Recitativo" for the violin, without accompaniment, leads back to a resumption of the first theme in its original simplicity, which

The finale (Allegro con fuoco), is in our opinion the least satisfactory movement of the sonata. This arises less from the nature of the ideas than from the form which Mr. Selby has chosen for it. After a first movement in "binary form," it would, we think, have been expedient either to conclude the work with a Rondo, or, at least, if the binary form were selected, to obtain as much contrast as possible in the treatment, as compared with the opening allegro. Here, however, the composer appears to have worked as nearly as he could on the same lines as before. We again find the second subject in D major, with a continuation in F sharp minor, in which key the first part concludes; we see also that after the return of the first subject in the latter half of the movement, the D major subject recurs, with some variation, in B minor, while the section in F sharp minor (which. by the way, is only a transposition of a part of the first subject) is not repeated. In construction the two movements might almost be called twins—an error of judgment, we cannot but think, on the part of the composer. Apart from the question of form, there is abundance of vigour and spirit in this finale, at the close of which Mr. Selby introduces in the bass one of the themes from the first allegro—an expedient frequently used by modern composers (as, for instance, by Brahms in his third symphony) to give unity to the entire work. But why does Mr. Selby finish with a finanissimo? As he has done the same in both the first and second movements, a vigorous close would have surely been more effective.

We have dealt at some length with this sonata, because it is a work which on its own merits deserves more than a few hasty lines. We have, therefore, criticised it freely but fairly, and have pointed out what we consider to be its defects in no unkindly spirit, but because it shows sufficient talent to warrant the hope that, with self-criticism, Mr. Selby may produce something even superior to his Opus 21. To sum up, the sonata is a composition not, indeed, of genius, but of sound musicianship and of even greater

Musical History; briefly narrated and technically discussed. With a Roll of the Names of Musicians, and the Times and Places of their Births and Deaths. By G. A. Macfarren. [Edinburgh: Adam and Charles Black.]

THIS work is a reprint, with amplifications, of an article by Sir George Macfarren in the "Encyclopædia Britannica," and although the history of the art is, as expressed upon the title-page, "briefly narrated," we can conscientiously affirm that it is so complete in every important particular as to form a thoroughly reliable reference for the student, and especially for one who seeks for intelligent opinions as well as bare facts. In tracing the progress of music in Europe during the last twenty-five centuries, it is a matter of extreme difficulty, where the space is so limited, to dwell sufficiently upon the career of those who may be said to have been the representative men of a certain period; but in all cases much judgment has been shown in the selection of artists whose claims deserve more lengthened recognition than others; and, as a specimen of searching criticism, we may mention the parallel between Handel and Bach, commenced at page 82. In the Introduction, alluding to the appended roll of the names of musicians, it is said, any names of interest are omitted, this is through oversight and not intention, and it must not be regarded as showing disesteem of such notabilities." Now, one of the most important names omitted is that of the author himself, the absence of which from the list of those living writers who have contributed works in the highest departments of the art, as well as in the "roll" alluded to, does indeed appear strange. Were the book a dissertation upon the genius of musical composers, we might make every allowance for the modesty of a critic who declines to classify himself; but this is a history, and in it, therefore, personal considerations should not be allowed to intrude.

Fünfzig Kinderlieder. Von G. Chr. Dieffenbach; für 2 Singstimmen mit leichter Klavier-Begleitung komponirt von Carl August Kern.

[Wiesbaden: C. G. Kunze's Nachfolger.]

The Germans have always excelled in the production of mive and simple poetry adapted to the understanding and appealing to the imagination of young children. In the present collection of fifty "Kinderlieder," Herr Dieffenbach has shown himself worthy of his numerous predecessors in his endeavour to kindle in the youthful mind a love of nature, and a healthy sympathy with all the creatures therein; a sufficient proof in itself of the author's own amiable and childlike disposition. The music to his verses, furnished by Herr Kern, though simple enough, is scarcely equal to the standard achieved by the poet. There is a strong family likeness in the majority of the composer's tunes which will be quickly discerned by young folks, and which, at any rate, does not add to their educational value from a musical point of view. Mozart, in his "Komm bis cradle-song "Schlaft have and a some well written in the province of the composer's stuations of the little dome throwing a mock heroic air are also some well written are also some well written cannot be strong family likeness in the majority of the composer's about," for contralto, may and which, at any rate, does not add to their educational value from a musical point of view. Mozart, in his "Komm bars of 3 and 2. We since which and the composer's throwing a mock heroic air.

Herzens-Söhnchen," have supplied us with such ideal examples of this kind of song that, perhaps, we have become somewhat too exacting in this direction. The fact, however, of the present being the fourth edition of these "Children's Songs" ought to speak for itself, and should encourage the issue of an English translation thereof (from the hand of a lady, we should say), as a very amiable and sympathetic addition to a field of musical literature in which there has been, as yet, no over-production in this country.

The Child's Garland. A collection of Three-part Songs for Children's voices. Composed by Franz Abt. The English version by the Rev. Dr. Troutbeck and Miss G. E. Troutbeck. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

With all who, like ourselves, advocate the desirability of placing fresh and hopeful words before juvenile vocalists, the little volume before us will most assuredly find favour; for the verses, in their excellent English translation, are full of that charming simple poetry which children are never tired of repeating. The pleasing melodies and easy three-part harmony to which they have been wedded by the genial composer, Franz Abt, fully prove his deep sympathy with "nursery music"; and during the coming festive season few more appropriate presents can be selected than this well-chosen "Garland" of poetry and song.

A Second Series of Church Songs. By Rev. S. Baring Gould, M.A., and Rev. H. Fleetwood Sheppard, M.A. [Skeffington and Son.]

We are told that although several songs in this collection are marked as solos, they may be sung according to the means at command—viz., in unison, chorus, or by any one set of voices. &c. The pieces are carefully selected, and the harmonies, mostly by the Rev. H. Fleetwood Sheppard, thoroughly satisfactory. In every respect the songs will be found well worthy of attention.

Trio (Canone) for Soprano, Contralto, and Baritone, or Tenor. Poetry by Thomas Moore. Music by Gordon Saunders. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

A TRIO in Canon form is always effective, and Mr. Saunders has here given us a melodious specimen of this class of composition, which should find favour with amateur vocalists. The baritone part being written an octave higher than it is sung, and some chromatic notes being enharmonically changed to make them easy for the singer, distract the eye in reading; but until we reform our anomalous method of expressing the pitch of voices, and of naming accidentals, we fear that the evil must be endured.

War in the Household (Der Häusliche Krieg). An Operetta: the German words by J. F. Castelli; the English translation by Marian Millar. The music composed by Henry Hiles. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE composer of this Operetta rightly felt that he had an excellent subject for the exercise of his talents, and has thrown an earnestness into his task which has produced admirable results. The dramatic power, indeed, evidenced in many of the scenes, is extremely striking, and gives a brightness to the effect of the story upon the listeners which, with more conventional and monotonous musical colouring, might become wearisome. All the choruses are full of life, and admirably illustrative of the text, that of the lady conspirators, in which they swear allegiance to the Countess, that of the dames and knights, cleverly carrying on the plot and counterplot, and the finale, in which, as usual, all are made happy, being good specimens of the composer's power of effectively grasping the varied situations of the little domestic drama, and especially of throwing a mock heroic air over some of the ultra-martial declarations both of the male and female characters. There are also some well written duets, amongst which "'Tis vain to strive," for contralto and baritone, must be especially commended. The short desponding air, " I creep about," for contralto, may also be mentioned in terms of praise; the 5-8 time, however, in which it is written, sounding to us—like all music thus marked—in alternate bars of 3 and 2. We sincerely hope that we may shortly

Summer. A Cantata for Female Voices. Written by Edward Oxenford. Composed by Franz Abt. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE charmingly fresh and sunny verses of Mr. Oxenford have received so sympathetic a setting in the work before us that we venture to predict for it a popularity even beyond any of the many Cantatas for female voices contributed by Franz Abt to the fast increasing repertory of drawing-room operettas. Apart from the tunefulness of the opening chorus, "The morning sun is rising," the suggestive character of the accompaniments throughout evidences much real dramatic power, and most happily initiates the nature of the subject chosen for musical illustration. Preceded by a brief duet, a pastoral song for soprano-a model of melodious simplicity-occurs; and this is followed by a chorus, the three parts in which flow throughout in loving company, accompanied only with placid and appropriate harmonies. A Recitative, for mezzo-soprano, leads to a Chorus and Duet, for soprano and mezzo-soprano, both of which may be commended not only for their musical attraction, but for the excellent manner in which they express the feeling of the words. In the Recitative and song for contralto, the accompaniment grows into importance, and the storm is well depicted throughout the solo, the calmness of the succeeding Chorus forming an effective contrast. A Choral piece, descriptive of sunset, concludes the Cantata, and leaves a similar impression upon the listener to that which is called up by a walk in the country on a lovely summer evening.

FOREIGN NOTES.

Amongst the musical events abroad during the past month, the first performance, at Brussels, of Wagner's "Die Meistersinger" necessarily occupies a prominent place in these columns. For many months past, as our readers will remember, this important première has been looked forward to with eager interest by music lovers of all shades of opinion. In our October number of last year, we ventured upon the following remarks concerning the expected event:—"We shall not be at all surprised if Wagner's 'Die Meistersinger,' truly and essentially German as that work is from beginning to end, will, after all, prove to be the herald of a general acceptance of the poet-composer's works in France, where so much foolish opposition is even now being exhibited in some quarters to the dead master, on account of his nationality. A representation of this masterly picture of honest German Philistine life during the middle ages; Shakespearian in spirit, and supported musically by all the subtleties of Wagnerian art, is . . . in course of preparation at Brussels, with a French version of the book from the pen of M. Victor Wilder . . . Our neighbours across the Channel are gifted with a quick perception and appreciation of the truly national in works of art, and the new French version of Wagner's 'Meistersinger' having once been successfully brought out in Belgium, the production and intelligent appreciation in the French capital of one of the artistic masterpieces of all ages will, we venture to predict in the interests of Frenchmen themselves, follow as a matter of course." Since we penned these lines some important steps have already been taken in French quarters towards the realisation of the prediction contained therein. During the last few weeks, performances of the entire music of the first and second acts of "Tristan und Isolde" have been given by the indefatigable conductor of the Chateau d'Eau Concerts, at Paris, M. Lamoureux, with the most unqualified success. remarkable still, a journal, devoted exclusively, and even fanatically, to the propaganda of Wagnerian art, and aided by the pens of some very able and distinguished French writers—the Revue Wagnérienne—has (as stated in our last issue) been started in the French capital, with presumably a very fair chance of material support on the part of the public. Nor are these merely isolated instances of the rapidly growing tendency in France to favour the once so much-hated Bayreuth reformer.

A crowded audience assembled to witness the first leading French press organs, testified by their presence to the importance attaching to this representation, which, prepared as it had been with infinite care and minute attention to all its details by the directors, MM. Stoumon and Calabresi, is generally admitted to have scored a signal success. Something of the enthusiasm which Wagner himself was wont to infuse into the spirit of even the most humble participators in the performances of his works seems to have pervaded the personnel of the theatre, which henceforth may justly pride itself upon having been the first to present Wagner's music-drama in the French language. In furnishing a few quotations from the most reliable journals connected with the art, we must give precedence to Le Guide Musical, the leading organ in matters musical in Belgium. This journal has for some time past prepared its readers, in judiciously written articles, for the present event, and in its most recent numbers it gives vent to a most refreshing (if, perhaps, somewhat premature) enthusiasm regarding the ultimate universal triumph of Wagner's art. It is evident that, at all events in this quarter, what used to be called the "music of the future" has become a very present and active principle. Le Guide Musical is full of praise concerning the performance as a whole, and the leading artists engaged therein—viz., MM. Seguin (Hans Sachs), Durat (Pogner), Soulacroix (Beckmesser), Jourdain (Walther), and Madame Caron (Eva), the latter being, however, considered scarcely well suited for the part. The journal quoted sums up its criticism of the performance with a hearty "Bravos à tous!" The French press, though it does not exhibit the almost youthful enthusiasm of its Belgian contemporary, is nevertheless inclined to be laudatory, both as regards the performance and the merits of the work itself. Thus M. Adolphe Jullien in Le Français makes use of the following expressions: "Within this national and picturesque framework, Wagner has created a delicious musical comedy, where grace and poetry, pedantic science, and true inspiration are represented, and placed in opposition to each other with a dramatic force and an art altogether incomparable. The audience, too, though at first taken aback, soon acknowledged by its plaudits the presence of genius." Similar eulogistic reports are contained in Le Progrés Artistique, and, as a matter of course, in the new Revuc Wagnérienne. On the other hand, there is no lack of antagonistic voices proceeding from the opposition camp. It is certainly curious to compare the above glowing resume of the merits of "Die Meistersinger," considered as a music-drama, given by Le Français, with such observations as "This strange piece . . . is the most curious dramatic olla podrida imaginable." "I applaud his (Wagner's) veritable chefs d'œuvres . . . but these 'Maîtres Chanteurs'—Ah, they produce an indigestion," made use of by M. Leemans in L'Art Musical. Still more severe is the criticism furnished in Le Ménestrel, from the pen of M. Arthur Pougin. This eminent musical savant has devoted some six columns of that leading French music journal to the demolishing of the poet-composer's only humorous Opera, which appears to him anything but humorous, however, but solemnly dreary almost from beginning to end. If humour there be, it is-well, l'humeur allemand. M. Pougin's strictures are, however, directed as much against the overbearing attitude of the ultra Wagnerians, as against the work under notice, "cette œuvre colossale et d'une digestion terrible." His observations are both interesting and instructive, as emanating from a very able and not unfairly biassed representative of the strictly classical school in France. The opinion of this critic as to the want of dramatic interest, and the utter absence of the humorous element in "Les Maîtres Chanteurs," has brought M. Kufferath, of the Guide Musical, again to the fore, and he, in the last number but one of that journal, compares Wagner's work with some of the most subtle Comedies of Molière, and undertakes, moreover, to explain to his Paris confrère the combined satire and humorousness of the various situations. We have read M. Kufferath's spirited article with much pleasure. At the same time we cannot but think that his ardour in the cause he so ably represents has in this instance led him too far. It is proverbially an unsatisfacperformance of "Les Maîtres Chanteurs," on the 7th ult., tory thing to have to explain either a satire or a comic at the Théâtre de la Monnaie of Brussels. Numerous situation. "Wenn Ihrs nicht fühlt, Ihr werdet's nicht foreign critics, amongst them the representatives of the erjagen"—if you do not feel it, you will search for it in vain-says Faust to his prosaic famulus in Goethe's worlddrama. Wagner's "colossal" and solitary attempt at a German "Comic-opera" will not be impeded in its progress of a general appreciation in consequence of the "indigestion" its performance may cause to some of its critics. In due course, and probably before long, its subtle musical beauties, the alternate satire and humorousness of its dramatic situations, and the historical truth and picturesqueness of its various scenes will be felt and applauded as much in Paris as, by the aid of M. Wilder's able translation, it is at the present moment being cordially appreciated by her French-speaking neighbours in the Belgian capital. It is rumoured in German musical circles that one of the favourite schemes of Richard Wagner-viz., the founding at Bayreuth of a model "Musik-Schule" for Germany, is about to be realised, thanks to the exertions of some influential German amateurs. Let us hope that rumour may, in the present instance, prove correct. Music in its most worthy practical results is, no doubt, cosmopolitan. But in order to bring about such results it must, in the first place, assert its national character and origin; and from this point of view a Bayreuth music school, largely in-fluenced as it most certainly would be by Wagnerian doctrines, could but be a boon to Germany and to the musical world generally. Indeed, with regard to a creative artist of the highest order, such as Wagner undoubtedly was, a famous passage in Mark Antony's speech in "Julius Cæsar" may fairly be reversed: "The good that men do lives after them, the evil is interred with their bones." So let it be with Wagner!

Herr Julius Stockhausen, who yields to none in his intelligent artistic appreciation of the works of Handel, celebrated the bi-centenary of the birth of the great master on February 24, by a model performance of "Acis and Galatea," with the members of his well known vocal academy at Frankfort, and some soloists specially engaged for the occasion. The part of Polypheme was rendered by Herr Stockhausen himself with that inimitable humour and consummate vocal skill which all who have heard Herr Stockhausen on the few occasions of his visits to England will be able to readily imagine. We may add that the annual performance of the Stern'sche Gesangverein, at Passion Music, on the 20th ult., was likewise specially entrusted to Herr Stockhausen this year, the conductor of the institution in question being indisposed.

A music festival is to take place on June 28 and 29 next at Kiel (Holstein), in commemoration of the joint bi-centenary of the birth of Handel and Bach, under the direction of Herr Joachim. The programme has not yet been published.

The Hamburg Stadt-Theater has recently contributed its share to the current Handel commemorations by a revival of that master's early (Hamburg) opera "Almira."

"Samson" was the Oratorio selected in homage to the memory of Handel by the Gürzenich Choir of Cologne. The performance, especially as regards the choral portions of the work, is said to have been an exceptionally fine one.

The Allgemeine Musik Zeitung, of Berlin, states that the present owner of the house, at Halle, in which Handel was born, Herr Gustav Steckner, himself an ardent admirer of the composer, has for some time past been solicitous to commemorate in a worthy manner, i.e., by an appropriate inscription, the exhibition, in the hall, of a bust of the composer, and of various groups of statuary suggestive of his principal works—the associations connected with "Halle's greatest son." Emblematical musical inscriptions are also to be affixed over the casements of every window in the frontage of the historical building.

Dr. Robert Franz, in view of his great merits as editor of the works of both Handel and Bach, has been unanimously elected "honorary citizen" of Halle by the Mu-

Madame Clara Schumann has been victimised in a most cruel manner; thieves having broken into her residence at Frankfort, abstracting all the manuscripts of her late husband, as well as numerous mementoes bestowed upon the composer by distinguished persons during his lifetime. The motives for this dastardly act appear to be, as yet, purely conjectural.

At a Matinée given on the 15th ult. by Professor Bargiel, at the Berlin Hochschule für Musik, two canons for soprano voices, "Benedictus" and "Osanna," composed by the English pianist, Miss Florence May, were sung by twelve lady-students of that school, accompanied on the pianoforte by Professor Bargiel, under whom Miss May has been studying counterpoint.

M. Eugen d'Albert has just completed the composition of a Concert Overture, entitled "Hyperion," which was included in the programme of the last Philharmonic Con-

Rubinstein's Opera "Nero" will be performed during this month at the Imperial Opera of Vienna. Performances of this remarkable composer's works have been more frequent in various parts of the Continent since our last remarks on that subject.

The editor of the music journal Das Orchester, published at Dresden, draws our attention to the fact of that paper having lately offered two prizes, of £ 15 and £5 respectively, and a diploma of honour as a third award, for the composition of a valse, for which he invites young English composers to compete. Space does not permit us to particularise the conditions for this competition, but they can be ascertained on application (in writing) to the office of The Musical Times. The time up to which manuscripts may be sent in expires (at Dresden) on the 30th inst.

It is stated in German papers that the long-expected autobiography of the veteran Franz Liszt is so far advanced that the publication of four out of the six volumes it is intended to comprise will shortly take place. Apart from the purely biographical interest attaching to such a work, the reminiscences of the author concerning the many celebrities, both musical and otherwise, with whom he has been on terms of intimate acquaintance during his long career, promise to render the appearance of these volumes a distinctly important event in biographical literature.

A sale of autographs by celebrated musicians will be held by the firm of List and Francke, of Leipzig, on the 8th inst. It includes more or less interesting specimens by Beethoven, Haydn, Weber, Mendelssohn, Cherubini, Schumann, Schubert, and others.

Herr Bilse, the celebrated Berlin conductor, has definitively announced his intention to retire from his distinguished position at the head of a model orchestra. Meanwhile strenuous efforts are being made in the German capital to keep this splendid body of instrumentalists together until another, and, if possible, equally capable conductor may be found.

At the second Mattinata Musicale given by Signori Buonamici, Chiostri, and Sbolci, on the 9th ult., at Florence, the programme included Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's Pianoforte Quartet in E flat (Op. 11), heard here for the first time. The success of the work was most complete, the composer (who was present) being called several times to the platform. Other numbers in the programme were Beethoven's String Quartet in C major (Op. 59), and Rubinstein's Sonata for pianoforte and violoncello in D major.

CAMBRIDGE.—In commemoration of the Handel bi-centenary, a performance of the Massiah was given in the Guildhall, on February 23. The principal artists were Miss Margaret Hoare, Miss Marian McKenzie, Mr. Harper Kearton, and Mr. Bridson; principal violin, Mr. F. Ralph; trumpet, Mr. T. Harper; organ, Mr. F. Dewberry; Conductor, Mr. William C. Dewberry. The band was specially augmented on this occasion from the Crystal Palace Orchestra and Italian Opera, and, with the chorus, numbered about 250 performers. The solos by Miss McKenzie and Mr. Bridson were very finely sung, while Miss Hoare and Mr. Kearton fully sustained their reputation. The rendering of the choruses was admitted by many to be the best and most efficient ever heard in Cambridge, the tone and attack being unusually good.

COLNBROOK, NEAR WINDSOR.—The members of the Choral Society gave a Concert at Stanwell, on the 11th ult, in aid of the funds of the Workmen's Club. The programme contained vocal and instrumental music. Mr. Richard Ratcliffe conducted.

CROYDON .- Mr. H. L. Balfour, Organist of St. Saviour's Church, gave CROYDON.—Mr. H. L. Balfour, Organist of St. Saviour's Church, gave an Invitation Concert, on the 19th lit. to exhibit the powers of a new organ he has had built by Messrs. Willis and Sons. The instrument contains a manual compass of 56 notes, CC to A, and pedal compass, CCC to F, 30 notes; 32 sounding stops, and 1820 pipes. Its tone throughout is good, some of the stops being particularly sweet. Mr. Balfour's selections included Mendelssohn's Sonata in F minor; Andante (Fourth Sonata), J. S. Bach; and Fugue, Schumann. The other artists were Mr. May Pauer, whose playing was highly appreciated, Miss Mary Willis, and Mr. T. W. Hanson, vocalists. There was a large audience. was a large audience

DALLINGTON:—A Concert was held, on February 25, in the Lectureroom of St. George's Presbyterian Church, in aid of the Sunday-school funds. The passor (the Rev. W. R. Rentoul) presided, and the hall was filled. The programme was well selected, and included a March by the Organist, Mr. Johnston, which was encored. At the close of the entertainment Mr. Semple presented Mr. and Mrs. Johnston (who are leaving the town for Newcastle) with a marble timepiece, in the name of the Sunday-school teachers, and in doing so referred to the recipients' long connection with the Sunday-schools and the great help they had rendered. Mr. Johnston was also presented with a metronome by Mr. J. C. Colson on behalf of the choir.

Guthrie gave a pleasing rendering of the serenade "Awake, Awake." A plane pleasing rendering of the serenade "Awake, Awake." A pleasing rendering of the second part, the familiar "Ye Shepherds tell me" was so splendidly rendered that it had to be repeated. A solo, "Rhenish Folk Song" (Mendelssohn), sung by A. E. Barlow, was also encored. "Wha'll be King but Charlie," and "Here's to the years that's awa," harmonised and scored by Sir H. Oakeley, were given by the whole chorus in good tune and tone, but rather boisterously at times; indeed, that was the one fault in the otherwise splendidly sung choruses. Bach's "Gavotte" was well played on the violoncello, and rapturously applauded, the performer, Mr. C. D. Hamilton, having to re-appear. A Minuet and Trio, incidental to "The Bachelor of Florence," by Sir H. Oakeley, in the style of the last century, was much appreciated and encored. The whole entertainment was most creditable both to the Conductor and the students.

ELLAND.—The Choral Society gave a very successful Concert on Tuesday evening, February 24, in the Congregational Assembly Room. The first part consisted of Gaul's Holy City, which was rendered by a chorus of about fifty voices, accompanied by an excellent band, comprising the principal performers of the Philharmonic Society, Huddersfield (known as Thomas's Band). The principal vocalists were Miss Bessie Holt, Miss Lily Parratt, Mr. P. Brearley, and Mr. W. Riley, all of whom acquitted themselves well. Mr. James Noble was conductor, and Mr. Jabez Garsed pianist. The second part of the programme was miscellaneous, prominent features in which were two pieces by the band—an overture, "La Souveraine," by Hermann, and a Bourreé (or dance) of Old Provence, by Reyloff. Miss Thomas also contributed with much success some selections from Il Trovatore on the violin. Miss Holt is an accomplished soprano, who sings with much ease, and was encored in both her songs. Miss Parratt, too, was recalled for the song "Daddy," but these encores, no doubt weld deserved, could not be compiled with.

Hebley, Stefffield.—The members of the Amateur Harmonic Society gave their seventeenth Subscription Concert, on the 5th ult, in the Vesty Hall, Cemetery Road. The programme consisted of selections from the works of Sir Henry Bishop and included some of the choicest specimens of his music, vocal and instrumental. The vocalists were Miss Hall, Miss Longden, Miss E. Hill, Mrs. Cooke, Miss Foxon, Miss Theorem and the Miss Townson, Mr. C. Elliott, Mr. R. Beazley, and Mr. Ash, who were all thoroughly efficient. Mr. J. A. Rodgers accompanied most satisfactory and played Bishop's Overture "Montrose." Orchestral accompaniments were used in the glees and very much improved them, especially "Now tramp o'er moss and fell," which was redemanded, as was also the Overture "Guy Mannering"; Mr. G. Marsden led the orchestra with his usual ability. There was a very large audience, and the pieces were received with warm applause. Mr. W. Chapman conducted.

KENDAL—An excellent Concert took place in St. George's Hall on Thursday, the 12th ult., the instrumental portion being sustained by local amateurs, under the conductorship of Mr. V. S. Smith. The vocalists were Miss Alma Hallowell, R.A.M., whose well-trained voice was heard to great advantage in the "Jewel Song," from Faust. In the second part of the programme she sang Harrier Kendall's song, "My kingdom," with exquisite taste and refinement. This was Miss Hallowell's second appearance, and the favourable impression she made on her first appearance was greatly strengthened on the present occasion. Miss Florence Hallowell, who possesses a very rich contralto voice of extraordinary range, was very successful in all her songs. Mr. Henry Taylor and Mr. George Allen were also highly efficient. Duets, quartets, &c., were admirably rendered by the above-named artists.

Louenbergought.—The Handle Discentenary was fittingly commemorated by a grand Handel Festival, which was given in the Baxter Gate Chapel, on Monday evening, February 23, the anniversary of the great composer's birthday. The inception of the Festival was due to Mr. G. Adocok, who has conducted all the subsequent arrangements, and his indefaitgable exertions assured the complete success of the performance. The programme was largely drawn from the oratorios Judas Maccabaus and Samson, with incidental solos from Joshua, St. Cecliat's Day, Theodova, Exio, Jephtha, Joseph, and Esther, the selection ending most appropriately with a solo and two choruses from The Messiah. The principal vocalists were Madame Jarratt, Miss Lymn, Mr. Castings, and Mr. Jackson, all of whom were highly efficient, Madame Jarratt creating a marked effect in "Let be bright seraphim" (with Mr. Gilbert's fine trumpet obbligato), Miss Lymn having to repeat "Return, O God of Hosts," and Messers. Castings and Jackson—the former in "Total eclipse" and the latter in "Honour and arms"—eliciting the most enthusiastic applause. All the choruses were rendered with commerdable precision, and the purely orchestral pieces—the March from the "Occasional Oratorio," a Minuet from Samson, and the "Dead March" from Saul—showed the powers of the band to much advantage, Mr. Adock conducted throughout with his usual skill and judgment, and Mr. Kilby was leader of the band.

MALDON.—A very successful Concert was given in the Public Hall, on the 6th ult, the first part of the programme consisting of Birchis operetta" The Merrie Men of Sherwood Forest." Mr.W. H. Daughtry's Choral Class, numbering sixty voices, sang well, and the solos were efficiently rendered by Miss Mary Scabrook (of the Guildhall School of Music), Mr. Driffield Smythe, Mr. J. H. Unwin (members of the class), Mr. J. W. Hanson, and Mr. J. Kempton. The accompaniments were played by the atring band of the Royal Engineers, and Mr. C. Oamond, Organist of St. Mary-at-the-Walls, Colchester, presided at the pianoforte. The second part was miscellaneous, and included songs by the above-named artists and Miss Osmond, a violin solo by Mr. Kitchin, and a clarinet solo by Mr. Collins. Mr. Daughtry conducted.

Markorze.—An excellent performance of Hayd's Creation was given by the members of the Choral Society, on the 17th Lit, in the Clitton-ville Hall. The solos were well sung by Miss Annie Matthewa, Markor Markorze, Alfred Kenningham, and Mr. F. Bevan. Mr. C. Gann led the band, Mr. J. W. Pearson conducted, and the pianoforte accompaniments were ably rendered by Miss Plummer.

were ably rendered by Miss Plummer.

NATAL—The Conductor's report of the Durhan Philharmonic Society gives an interesting review of the work of the institution for the past twelve months. The list of public performances included five Oratorios, with full orchestrial accompaniments, and a large number of works by the great composers. It is proposed that the Society shall celebrate the opening of the Durhan Town Hall by a Musical Festival, and that an Ode, written and composed for the occasion, shall be performed, with the aid of friends from Maritzburg and elsewhere. The Committee of the Natal Caledonian Society gave an excellent Concert in the Philharmonic Hall in celebration of the birthday of Burns. There was a large attendance, and the selection of music was most efficiently rendered.

Newbury.—The last Concert of the present season in connection with the Literary and Scientific Institution, was given on the 17th ult, in the Town Hall, before a numerous audience. St. Leonard's-ow-Sea.—Lent this year has been celevised. Series of special oratorio services in St. Paul's Church. The first of these was held on the evening of February 26, when (this year being the bic centenary of the great master's birth) Handle's Messiah was sung by the choir and members of the Choral Union. The solos were taken principally by puils of Dr. Abram, assisted by Madame Poole. The choruses were all well sung. Mr. E. Kennard most ably second service was held on the 11th ult, when Mendelssohn's Etijoh was sung. Madame Poole took the contrains solos, and gave a very fine rendering of "Woe unto them," "O rest in the Lord," and the part of the Queen. The music of the prophet was rendered in a most nished manner by Mr. Winn, and the tenor solos were taken, by Messra. Simson and Seamark, both of whom gave great satisfaction. The soprano portion was very creditably sung by Miss Hill. The choruses all went grantly, and were attacked throughout with great aprirt. Mr. E. Kennard accompanied on the organ, and Dr. Abram conducted. The third service was held on the 23rd ult, when Messischia Paral Psania and Hymn of Praiss were selected for performance. The soprano solos were taken by Miss M. Catilsie, whose dinging was much admired. In the Hyms of Praiss, the deat "I waited for the Lord" was sung by Miss Catilsie and Miss Hodson.

The other vocalists were Messrs. Simson, Seamark, and Chesterfield. Mr. F. Maggs accompanied on the organ, and the whole was under the direction of Dr. Abram, who conducted.

SELNIRK.—Handel's bi-centenary was celebrated on Monday, February 23, the Rev. J. Farqubarson, M.A., giving a biographical and critical lecture on the composer, the musical illustrations being fournished by the Selkirk Choral Union, under the leadership of Mr. Mitchell, F.C.O.

SHERBORNE -A double performance of The Messiah, in honour of SHERBONNE—A double performance of The Messiah, in honour of the Handel bi-centenary, took place in the Abbey, on February 25. The choir was assisted by that of Holy Trinity, Dorchester, by members of Wimborne Minster choir, and that of St. Michael's Church, Exeter, as well as by many friends in Sherborne. Mr. Richmond, Organist of St. Michael and All Angels, Exeter, presided efficiently at the organ, in place of Mr. Lyle, who conducted. The choruses were rendered with much effect, and the solo vocalists, Miss Effic Clements, Madame Osborne Williams, Messrs. Haydn and Thomas, were thoroughly satisfactory; "The trumpet shall sound" (with a well played cornet obbligato), by the last-named singer, being highly appreciated.

SPALDING.—A Concert was given by the members of the Christian Association Choral Class, on February 25, the principal items in the rrogramme being Mendelssohn's "Haym of Praise" and "Hear my Prayer." Mr. E. Dunkerton, of Lincoln Cathedral, and Miss Laura Foster were the soloists, and Mr. Price, Organist of Spalding Parish Church, conducted. The second part of the programme was wiscellaneous. miscellaneous.

STOCKPORT .- On Monday, the 16th ult., the Musical Society gave a STOCKFORT.—On Monday, the 10th ult, the Musical Society gave a performance of Handel's yudas Macacabars, in the Volunteer Armoury, before a large audience. The principal vocalists were Mrs. Catherine Bradley, Mrs. Knowles, Miss Margaret Leyland, Mr. Kendel Thompson, and Mr. A. S. Kinnel. The band and chorus numbered 250, many of the instrumentalists belonging to Mr. Charles Halle's orchestra. Mr. Joseph Bradley, Mus. Bac., Oxon., Organist of St. Thomasis, Heaton Norris, conducted. The Oratorio was admirably STROUD .- The Concert annually given by Mr. Chew for the benefit STROUD.—The Concert annually given by Mr. Chew for the benefit of the funds of the Stroud Hospital took place at the Subscription Room, on the 10th ult., before a large audience. The vocalists—whose services were entirely gratuitious—were Miss Marie Etherington, R.A.M., Miss Eleanor Rees, R.A.M., the Rev. N. Morgan Brown, B.A., and Mr. T. Brandon, Mr. Chew's string band lending able assistance by the performance of several pieces. Miss Rees, whose previous appearances in Stroud were remembered with much pleasure, was highly successful in all her songs, especially in "I dream I was in Heaven," from Costa's Nammar, Wiss Etherington made an excellent impression in the air "Angels ever bright and fair," and also in two ballads, the Rev. Morgan Brown and Mr. Brandon also eliciting warm applause. Two vocal quartets, sung by the above-named artists, were welcome features in the programme, Sterndale Bennett's "God is a spirit" being redemanded.

TROWSEIGNE.—The members of the Charal Society gave their first

TROWSRIDGS.—The members of the Choral Society gave their first Concert in Hill's Hall on the 3rd ult. Dr. Stainer's Daughter of Jains constituted the first part of the programme, and the second was miscellaneous. The vocalists were Miss Mansfield and Messrs. Morgan and Francome; solo pianist, Mdlle. Jutz (medalist of the Conservatoire, Geneva), and Conductor, Mr. O. A. Mansfield, F.C.O., Uppingham.—On Tuesday, the 24th ult., a Concert in honour of Bach and Handel was given at the Uppingham School. The selections from Bach comprised the Suite in D minor, and a Chaconne, played by Herr Joachim; Handel's Sonata in A major was also given. Mr. John Probert and Mr. F. Bevan sang solos from The Messiah and Christmas Oratorio.

WALSALL.—On Monday evening, the 23rd ult., an Organ Recital was given by Mr. J. C. Clarke, L.R.A.M., in Wesley Chapel, Ablewell Street. The selection of music included Handel's Overture to the Oratorio of Esther, Bach's Fugue in D. Dr. Heap's Andante Grazioso, Guilman's Funeral March and Chant Séraphique, and J. C. Clarke's Triumphal March in E flat. The Recital gave great satisfaction.

WEST ARDSLEY.—On the 14th ult. an excellent Concert was given in the Board School by the Morley Choral Union. The programme was varied and well selected, and both in the vocal and instrumental department every piece was efficiently rendered. Mr. Thomas Earn-WESTON-SUPER-MARE.—Mr. William Chinnock Dyer, Organist and Director of the Choir of Holy Trinity Church, has recently been presented with a beautifully finished oak writing-case, filled with every requisite, and also an inkstand of oak, elegantly mounted with silver. The gift was accompanied by an address from the Vicar and members topast and present) of the Choir of Holy Trinity Church, alluding in flattering terms to his valuable labours among them for many years.

WEYMOUTH.—The new organ, built by Mr. C. Martin, of Oxford, for the Maiden Street Wesleyan Chapel, was opened on Wednesday, the 1xth ult., by Mr. T. W. Dodds, Mus. Bac., who displayed the beauties of the instrument to the fullest extent. The Recital was interspersed with vocal selections, excellently rendered by the Choir, under the Conductorship of Mr. Sykes, the solos being taken by Mrs. Rogers, Miss Hawkes, the Rev. — Eyre, and the Rev. W. Lewis.

Miss Hawkes, the Rev. — Eyre, and the Rev. W. Lewis.

Winchester.—The bicentenary of the birth of Handel was celebrated by a performance of The Messiah, under the auspices of the Winchester Choral Society, in the Guidhall, on Perbury 23. The band and chorus numbered about one hundred executants, Mr. C. Gamblin ably officiating as Conductor. The solo vocalitist were Miss Marie Gane, Miss Eliza Thomas, Mr. John Probert, and Mr. Egbert Roberts. Miss Gane was highly successful in "I know that my Redeemer liveth," and Mr. Roberts created a genuine effect in all the music entrusted to him, "Why do the nations" and "The trumpet shall sound" (with trumpet obbligato by Mr. T. Brown) eliciting cauline and well deserved marks of approbation. All the choruses were admirably rendered, and the work was thoroughly appreciated by a large audience.

WOLVERHAMPTON:-The members of the Festival Choral Society WOLVERRAMPTON.—The members of the Festival Choral Society gave their fourth and concluding Concert of the present series, in the Agricultural Hall, on Friday evening, the 20th ult. The work chosen for performance was Bach's Passion (St. Matthew), which was excellently rendered, the Chorals and Choruses being splendidly sung. The solo vocalists were Miss Anna Williams, who was highly effective in "Breek and die" and "For love of us," Miss E. Lloyd, Mr. Wade, but the concern the control of the cont

WEXEMAM.—On Monday, February 23, the third Annual Musical Festival was held in the Public Hall. The afternoon meeting, which was of a purely competitive character, attracted a very large audience. Mr. Benjamin Piercy was the President, the adjudicator was Dr. Henry Hiles, and Mr. Alfred Knight, of Oswestry, accompanied. The prize of one guines for the tenor soio "Be thou faithful," was awarded prize of the guines for the tenor soio "Be thou faithful," was awarded to the companied of the prize of the guines for singing, unaccompanied, the Quarter "Hear us, Lord" (Rossini), to the Misses Lucas and Lewis, and Messre, H. Owen and E. Rogers; the prize of one guines for the has solo" It is enough," to Mr. W. J. Thomas, and the prize of one guines for the soprano solo "Haste ye birds" (Gumbert), to Miss. L. Ellis, of Oswestry. The piece selected for village choirs was "O hush thee my bable" (Sullivan), the first prize, a banner of homour, being presented to the Rev. G. J. Howson, of Overton Choir, and the second prize of three guiness being withheld. The Juvenile Choir competition consisted of Callcott's "May Fly," the prize of four guineas, offered by Mr. Evan Morris, being awarded to the Lodge and Bronygath Juveniles; Conductor, Mr. H. M. Hughes. The prize of one guinea, offered by Mr. F. Yang for singing at sight, was awarded to Mr. W. Parry, of Acrefair. For the principal choral competition, "Witter days" (Caldicti), two prizes were offered—the first, consisting of twenty-one pounds Acrefair. For the principal choral competition, "Winter days" (Caldictott), two prizes were offered—the first, consisting of twenty-one pounds and a bâton for the Conductor, was awarded to the Acrefair Choir, Conductor, Mr. J. T. Gabriel; and the second, of five guineas, to the Wrexham Philinamonic Society; Conductor, Mr. W. H. Holt. An excellent Concert was given in the evening, the artists including Madams Georgina Burns, Miss Jessie Breakenridge, Mr. G. H. Welch, R.A.M., Mr. Leslie Crotty, Mr. Frank Weston (solo violoncello), Mr. S. Kirkham, Mr. E. Edwards, Mr. Henry Broadley, and Mr. Josef Cantor, Conductor.

"Dear Sir,—You will be pleased to hear that your Patent Perfection Pedal Attachment and Pedals give me every assistation. I carefully inspected, without prejudice, several attachments in London before purchasing, and finally decided that yours was the best, and have never regretted my choice. I have had your attachment in constant use for over a year, during which time it has worked splendidly, and with your latest Improvements (for instantly removing or disconnecting pedals) is all one could desire. I have saved already half the cost I should otherwise have spent for organ practice, residing as I do at a long distance from my appointment.—Yours sincerely,

"G. A. GRINDLEY,

"Organist Chatsworth Road Church, Lower Norwood, S.E., London."

"Le Châlet, Great Malvern.

"Lancashire, has fitted to my piano a set of his Organ Pedals and Perfection Action, which are in every way most satisfactory. The susperiority of his Patent over those I have already seen and used is most obvious.

"GEORGE THOMPSON, M.A."

"Dear Sir,—I have deferred writing to comment upon your Pedals and Action now attached to my pianoforte until I could satisfy myelf of their utility and efficiency. I can now conscientiously say that they more than fulfi all my anticipations. Although I am no carpetter, aided by your lucid diagram I had little difficulty in attaching them myself, and it is impossible to over-estimate the comfort they give to me or to conceive the saving of time one experiences in one's own room.—Believe me, yours truy,

"To Mr. Answorker" "BURNHAM HORNER, F.R.Hist.S."

"Eldon, Woodhouse Lane, Leeds.

"Dear Sir,—I am glad to inform you that the Organ Pedais and Perfection Action work perfectly throughout. The Action possesses all the merits you claim for it, and I shall always be pleased to recommend it.—I remain, yours truly, Extract from Notice in Pianoforte Dealers' Guide, November, 1884.

"The music trade must often have had requests for an action of this kind, and as we believe Mr. Ainsworth's invention to be perfectly unique, and as such will gratify the most sanguine expectations, we have therefore much pleasure in drawing their attention to it, at the same time feeling confident it is worthy the recommendation of cveryone."

Extract from Christian Union, Spring Number, 1884.

"As the study of organ and pianoforte is becoming a general accomplishment, Ainsworth's Patent Action and Pedals are calculated to prove an incalculable boon to all musical students, and there can be no doubt that it will become generally adopted. To Mr. Ainsworth organ learners owe a debt of gratitude."

MUSIC OF THE BIBLE

DEVELOPMENT OF MODERN MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS FROM ANCIENT TYPES, BY JOHN STAINER, M.A., Mus. Doc.

"The very excellent illustrations scattered throughout the book materially increase its value; and we sincerely hope that Dr. Stainer's labours may be rewarded as they deserve, for not only has be accumulated a large mass of reliable information upon a subject of the deepest interest, but he has thrown additional light upon much of this evidence by giving us the result of his own practical experience."—Musical Times.

JOHN SEBASTIAN BACH

J. F. BRIDGE, AND JAMES HIGGS, Mus. Doc., Oxon. Mus. Bac., Oxon.

BOOK I .- EIGHT SHORT PRELUDES AND FUGUES ox I.—EIGHT SHORT PRELUDES AND FUGUES.

In this edition much help is offered towards a correct and effective rendering of Bach's Organ Music. The distribution of the parts between the two hands is clearly shown. The notes most conveniently played by the right hand are printed on the ubper, and those best taken by the left hand on the lower, of the two manual staves. The pedalling is indicated where necessary. Marks of expression and phrasing are added occasionally, and suggestions for the effective use of the organ are given throughout. The Preface contains many useful hints.

Book II.—PRELUDES, FUGUES, AND TRIO

The second book of the new edition of Bach's Organ Works is more advanced in point of difficulty than the first, and will be found of conspicuous interest. It includes the well-known "Giant" in D minor, the shorter Prelude and Fugue in E minor (a great favourite with Mendelssohn), and an exceedingly effective Prelude and Fugue in C minor, in addition to other lessknown but important works. It is a specialty of this edition that a convenient and effective mode of performance is everywhere indicated. Appended to the

BOOK III.—PRELUDES, FUGUES, AND FANTASIAS ...

The third book contains compositions of greater difficulty, it is therefore more fully fingered and marked for the pedals. It is believed Organ Students will derive the greatest possible assistance by having their attention directed from the outset to a convenient method of dealing with each difficulty as it arises. The present book includes the Fugue in B minor, on a subject from Corelli, a beautiful Prelude and Fugue in A major (most useful for obtaining command of the higher part of the Pedal-board), a Prelude and Fugue in C major, a Fautasia and Fugue in C minor, and the well-known short G minor Fugue. There is, as usual, in this Edition a Preface containing interesting particulars of the several works.

BOOK IV .- SONATAS FOR TWO MANUALS AND PEDALS

PEDALS

The fourth book contains the first three of the six celebrated Sonatas or Trios for two-manual and pedal. Spitta says: "These Sonatas were intended by J. S. Bach to complete the education of his eldest son, Wilhelm Friedemann, as an organist." They are invaluable as studies and very beautiful as music. In the present edition they are for the first time fingered and marked for the Pedals. the Pedals.

MUSICAL BIOGRAPHY JOSEPH BENNETT.

CHERUBINI MENDELSSOHN MEYERBEER

PROSPECTUS.

Some years have passed since Mr. Joseph Bennett began, in the Musical/Times, a series of biographical notices which are still far from ended. The original purpose was a limited one—namely, to throw light upon the personality of famous musicians by means of extracts selected and arranged from their letters and other writings. Hence the series had for first tille "The Great Composers, sketched by themselves."

Consequent upon the remarkable favour with which the notices were received, it was determined to extend their acope, and, while making prominent the Masters' own testimony, to deal with each subject in a complete biographical form, as far as allowed by the limits necessarily imposed. The words "sletched by themselves" were It was further resolved to make additions in the case of the composers dealt with under the original idea, and to issue the notices separately as "Primers of Musical Biography."

The intention of "Novello's Primers of Musical Biography" is to convey, as clearly as the limits of an elementary work will allow, a just idea of each composer's personality, and to record the principal events of his life. Knowledge of what a man is helps the understanding of what he does. These little books may serve, therefore, as a first step towards acquaintance with the genius and compositions of the masters to whom they are devoted.

For the copious extracts made from letters, &c., throughout the

Price Eighteenpence. In Cloth Boards, Three Shillings.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS, &c.

"Tenbury, July 14, 1884. Exercises. They seem to me admirable, and doubtless will prove of great utility .- I am, yours faithfully,

"FREDERICK A. G. OUSELEY."

" October 4, 1884.

"I like the Vocal Exercises very much; they are scientific, systematic, and ingenious.

"IOHN STAINER."

"This is a novel work, both in plan and detail, and the combined labours of a well-known scientific lecturer on the voice and an excellent musician have brought the undertaking to a successful issue. . . The exercises are melodious and attractive, and are planned to do their work without the possibility of strain or fatigue. The pianoforte part is everywhere judicious and artistic. These very complete and satisfactory training exercises are printed in six different books for the same number of voices, thus: soprano, mezzo-soprano, contralto, tenor, baritone, and bass. The work may be safely and cordially recommended to vocal students and even to practised singers, quite apart from any grounds of discussion concerning methods of teaching."-Musical Standard, August 30, 1884.

"The conjunction of science and musicianship expressed by the names of the two authors of this well thought of and well carried out work is a sufficient guarantee as to its objectivity and musical adaptability. . . . The exercises are, with great skill, arranged so as to give a maximum of benefit with a minimum of fatigue. They are melodious and natural, and are consequently pleasant of performance. accompanying pianoforte part is helpful without being either distracting or unduly prominent; and the work is throughout characterised by artistic forethought and good musicianship. Its popularity will doubtless be extensive in accordance with its merits."—Academic Gazette, September 1, 1884.

'They are constructed so as to fit in with the vocal principles which Mr. Behnke teaches, while at the same time they are melodious and interesting."-Tonic Sol-fa Reporter, August, 1884.

"This is a valuable series of vocal studies, based on the principles advocated in 'The Mechanism of the Human Voice,' by E. Behnke, and in the more elaborate work, by Messrs. Lennox Browne and Emil Behnke, entitled 'Voice, Song, and Speech.' . . . The exercises are published for each of the several ranges of voice, and from their utility and cheapness they deserve to find a very large sale."-Illust London News, August 9, 1884.

"They will not only be found most valuable and admirably adapted My dear Sir, -I am much obliged to you for sending me your Voice to the purpose for which they were written, but they are at the same time melodious and attractive. The work is quite devoid of theory for which the authors refer elsewhere, and it is divided into progressive parts, each part containing exercises on the various details requiring cultivation and development in the production of a good voice. These exercises are the best of the kind we have seen, and clearly printed and neatly got up. We wish the authors every success in their endeavours to facilitate the cultivation of vocal art."— Public Opinion, September 12, 1884.

> "A personal experience in my own family enables me to speak in the highest terms of Mr. Behnke's method, which is absolutely invaluable for increasing the power, resonance, and flexibility of the voice, both n speaking and singing, and I am glad to be able to recommend the exercises as being thoroughly practical and most useful."-C. D., Household Words, October 11, 1884.

> "The combined simplicity and utility of the plan upon which these studies have been written will commend them to the notice of professors and students alike. Theoretical subjects are wisely eschewed, and the books deal solely with matters that concern the actual training of the voice. Proper importance has been lent to the system of production, and the exercises on Resonance and Attack will especially be found excellent. Altogether Messrs. Behnke and Pearce's studies are of a description that cannot fail to be used with beneficial effect."-Sunday Times, August 31, 1884.

> "That the work is based upon sound philosophical principles is certain, and it may be said with confidence that no better exercises for the purposes of voice cultivation are to be met with. No attempt is made to teach the art of singing from notes. The compilers' efforts have been directed to special objects-the production of pure vocal tone and the power of commanding the vocal organs-and we can confidently recommend the publication to those who are pursuing these objects."-Birmingham Gazette, August 14, 1884.

> "The exercises are emphatically practical; but they are enhanced in value by pretty and attractive melody, occasionally rising far above the character of mere training compositions."-Salisbury Times, August 2, 1884.

> "The authors have conferred a great boon on the musical world and on the public generally by the publication of these exercises, which so happily combine science with simplicity, and system with The very youngest pupils will feel and enjoy all this, and the elder ones will see that a new era has dawned in instruction books for singers."-Oldham Evening Chronicle, August 19, 1884.

PROSPECTUS.

Some years have passed since Mr. Joseph Bennett began, in The Musical Times, a series of biographical notices which are still far from ended. The original purpose was a limited one—namely, to throw light upon the personality of famous musicians by means of extracts selected and arranged from their letters and other writings. Hence the series had for first title "The Great Composers, sketched by them-Selves."

Consequent upon the remarkable favour with which the notices were received, it was determined to extend their scope, and, while making prominent the Masters' own testimony, to deal with each subject in a complete biographical form, as far as allowed by the limits necessarily imposed. The words "aketched by themselves" were therefore dropped from the title.

It was further resolved to make additions in the case of the composers dealt with under the original idea, and to issue the notices separately as "Primers of Musical Biography."

The intention of "Novello's Primers of Musical Biography" is to convey, as clearly as the limits of an elementary work will allow, a just idea of each composer's personality, and to record the principal events of his life. Knowledge of what a man is helps the understanding of what he does. These little books may serve, therefore, as a first step towards acquaintance with the genius and compositions of the masters to whom they are devoted.

towards acquantance with the genture amounts, see, throughout the to whom they are devoted.

To whom they are devoted. They are the best material upon which to base an estimate of character.

THE MUSICAL TIMES

AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.

MAY 1, 1885.

THE EDUCATIONAL VALUE OF DANCE MUSIC.

LITTLE excuse is needed for choosing such an apparently frivolous topic for discussion in the columns of The Musical Times after the recent action of the Aberdeen Presbytery. The subject of dancing has been elevated into public notice, and may figure among the themes of debate at future Social Science Congresses. The whole speech of the divine who moved the "deliverance" was calculated to awaken Homeric laughter in the breasts of those who see in dancing nothing but a healthy and harmless recreation, but there was one passage in which he surpassed himself by the vivid picture drawn of the evils which attend the spread of "balls, dancing parties, and promiscuous gatherings of people of both sexes for indulging in springs and flings and artistic circles and close-bosomed whirlings." Let it be clearly understood, however, before we go any further, that it is not our intention to discuss the morals of the ballet, or to weigh the pros and cons that should determine the choice of dancing as a profession. We have not the knowledge or experience requisite for the achievement of such a task, and even if we had, the warning to be drawn from the stormy results of Mr. Burnand's ill-starred polemics would certainly deter us from an enterprise only too sure to rekindle the odium theatricum he has so rudely awakened. No, we have no aim save the offering of a few discursive remarks on the music of the ball-room, old and new, and the educational influence it is capable of exerting on the embryonic artistic instincts of the dancing British public. It would not be difficult to account for the present characteristics of dancing and dance music in England on the strictest principles of the doctrine of Evolution. They have been developed by their environment and re-act upon that environment. Our national reserve, the dislike we Englishmen entertain for anything that is emotional and impassioned in gesture, the invariable practice of hosts and hostesses of asking at least once and half as many guests as their rooms can conveniently hold, and the imperfect sense of rhythm possessed by the majority of English gentlefolk, have combined to develop a school of English dance music of which the prevailing characteristics are a mawkish monotony, a cloying sweet-ness, a religious avoidance of anything approaching syncopation, freshness, or piquancy of rhythm, in fine, a steady adherence to the smooth levels of the flattest insipidity. The music of the ball-room and the concert-hall, on the one hand, and that of our churches, on the other, seem to have changed places. Our waltzes and ballads are as sad and serious as hymns, and our hymn-tunes far more lively than our waltzes. We are well aware of the gravity of some of these charges and of the indignation they will excite in the minds of many young ladies. But we are prepared to substantiate them. We have accused our well-bred fellow-countrymen and women of a defective sense of rhythm, and in proof thereof we have only to point to their constant habit of waltzing to a polka, or to the naïve request made by so many young ladies, if they find the music rather too fast, "Shall we dance halftime?"—a fallacy very properly exploded by Mr. Gurney in a paper in the Nineteenth Century some years back; and lastly, to the fact that many dancers, whose step and smoothness are irreproachable, only keep time with the music when it happens to coincide with their own habitual tempo. These criticisms, however, are fortunately not applicable to all strata of society. A far truer sense of rhythm and capacity for keeping time are displayed by Lancashire millhands dancing in the street to a barrel-organ than by our jeunesse dorée in the drawing-rooms of Mayfair. A Kerry peasant, whose idea of vocal and instrumental music is barbarous in the extreme, will vet beat out with his clumsy brogues every note of a quick jig-tune with the most perfect accuracy. And the same remark applies to English clog-dancers. Now, there is nothing in the fashionable dance music of the day to educate the ear or sense of rhythm-to our mind, one of the chief functions of dance music. It is impossible to get out of step with a tune when the stress falls with unfailing regularity on the strong beat. On the other hand, we hold that there is a certain charm in surmounting any little rhythmical difficulty caused by the introduction of syncopation, or by the antagonism of the beats, or by any of the methods which lend variety and freshness to the monotony of the waltz tempo. But these are the identical qualities which are tabooed and condemned in our ballroom music. Only the other day, on hearing, to our great delight, sandwiched between a layer of sickly modern waltzes, an old favourite by Strauss, we accosted the musician in the interval and congratulated him on his hardihood. "Well," he replied, "if ever I do get the chance of playing Strauss's waltzes, the time seems to go twice as quick. But it's as likely as not that if I begin to play one, somebody comes up and says, 'For goodness' sake don't play that jumpy thing,' and I have to stop." In these days, when Strauss is a drug in the market—we use the name Strauss generically and has been dethroned, in England, at least, from his well-merited pre-eminence by the writers of what we may call the Pomatum school, it may not be out of place to remind our readers of the estimate formed of his services by a great and fastidious critic, whose competence to judge of matters relating to rhythm will not be questioned.

Berlioz—for we refer to him—in the course of one of his brilliant letters from Vienna, gives a most interesting picture of the balls at the Salle des Redoutes, where he spent "whole nights watching thousands of incomparable waltzers whirling about. . . . And then there is Strauss conducting his fine orchestra; and when the new waltzes he writes expressly for each fashionable ball turn out successful, the dancers stop to applaud him, the ladies approach the platform and throw him bouquets. . . . This is only fair, for Strauss is an artist. The influence he has already exercised over musical feeling throughout Europe in introducing cross rhythms into waltzes is not sufficiently appreciated. If, out of Germany, the public at large can be induced to understand the singular charm frequently resulting from the opposition and superposition of contrary rhythms, it will be owing to Strauss. Beethoven's marvels in this style are too far above them, and act only upon exceptional audiences; Strauss has addressed himself to the masses, and his numerous imitators have been forced, whilst imitating, to second Berlioz has perhaps slightly exaggerated the magnitude of the services rendered by Strauss in the cause of "the emancipation of rhythm"; but many other eminent musicians have felt, and still feel, the fascination of these charming and piquant waltzes, which, as compositions, rank immeasurably above the great mass of those in vogue at the present day. We have the greatest sympathy for a friend of ours, who once gave vent to his feelings thus, "You know, I consider the 'Blue Danube' such an important know very well, I'd rather not dance it at all." we fear there are very few enthusiasts who approach the matter in so reverential a spirit as this gentleman. The fact remains, however, that our modern English ballroom music is but sorry stuff, thin in construction, wearisome by its monotony, and destitute of any rhythmic variety. The conclusion to be drawn from this is not flattering to native talent, for the same countries that have given to the world the greatest composers and executants have produced the finest dance music. We cannot resist the temptation here of uttering a protest against the practice of getting dance music composed "expressly for the purpose" on the occasion of the revival of famous plays, when music already exists which has stood the test of time, or which bears the unmistakable impress of genius. Are there no stately minuets which might have been laid under requisition to accompany the dancers in the ballroom scene in "Romeo and Juliet"? Apparently not, if we are to judge from a recent performance at the Lyceum. And though Berlioz and Gounod and Raff, to mention no others, have written brilliantly on this theme, no shred of their works was vouchsafed us. No, but in contrast with the pity and horror of this most moving tragedy, we must needs have a tawdry waltz with an Italian title, and breathing about as much Italian air as may be found in the tunnels of the Underground Railway. This blunder, perhaps the worst blot on a really interesting revival, was all the more remarkable as it was in contrast with the archæological spirit which marked the rest of the mounting. It is a blunder, however, which was repeated, though in a less exasperating form, in the production of "As you Like it" at the St. James's Theatre.

But to revert to the main question-the educational function of dance music. We have no desire to condemn it wholesale. On the contrary, we yield to no one in the enjoyment of a good waltz. Only we believe that, without making it a bit less attractive, writers of dance music could do valuable service in educating the ear and sense of rhythm of their patrons and patronesses if they would more often forsake the grooves into which they have fallen. Popular and clever writers may take liberties, and the success which has attended a really spirited waltz like "Estudiantina" is a hopeful sign. In the same way, we welcome the introduction of any unusual harmonies like those employed by the Herrn Delbrück. Such refreshing innovations assist in the work of emancipation alluded to above. For let no one minimise or attempt to underrate the value of such stepping-stones in music or in any other art. They are inevitable and indispensable, and peculiarly so in a race of our temperament, which in quickness and diversity of emotional sensibility is behind the French and Italians. We English are slow to accept artistic facts, but very tenacious of them once apprehended, perhaps too tenacious. An artist of established reputation can take liberties with an English audience which would be impossible elsewhere. In Italy a singer may be hissed in one act of an opera and applauded vehemently in another on the same night. We have not the same æsthetic elasticity, and apply more unyielding canons. If our premises be granted—that the musical education of the people should be gradual and come from below-the value of these minor branches of the art, dance music and operetta, will not be denied. And to prove that familiarity with these branches need not necessarily contaminate, we have only to point to the numerous instances of great artists who have risen from these lower levels, and, while shaking themselves free of the slough of former phases of professional existence, have gained in cathothing that unless I've got a first-rate partner whom I licity of expression from the very comprehensiveness of their experience. Out of a host of instances we will take only a couple. Materna, the famous German dramatic singer, was a popular Viennese favourite in comic operetta in 1867, on the authority of Mr. Beatty-Kingston. And, to come down to an entirely contemporary date, the charming and sympathetic actress who has lately won the hearts of all who saw her in the "Maître de Forges" and "Frou-Frou," Madame Jane Hading, was, but a few years back, a moderately successful performer in opera-bouffe.* So far, however, from having suffered from such antecedents, they have only lent her lightness and versatility, and her musical training has enabled her to sing tunefully and in good taste such songs as may occasionally fall to her lot. Verily, everything is good in art to those who are gifted with discrimination and a sense of proportion. That sense of proportion seems to be sadly out of gear when we encounter disguised hymn-tunes in the ballroom, and undisguised popular songs in religious processions. People will go on dancing, in spite of the fulminations of the Presbytery of Aberdeen, for the desire "to throw a loose leg," as the Irish say, is ingrained in human nature. But if we cannot improve our home-manufactured dance music, let us put our pride in our pocket and import more freely from abroad, unless such a course is rendered impossible by the inauguration of a policy of musical protection, which we are almost inclined to believe would find favour in the sight of some of our native artists.

OBSERVATIONS ON MUSIC IN AMERICA

By Joseph Bennett.
III.—ORCHESTRAL AND CHORAL MUSIC.

Such remarks as I have to offer upon orchestral music in America must be taken in connection with a peculiar feature indicated in my preliminary article. I there pointed out that American orchestras are almost exclusively composed of imported players, under conductors many of whom are aliens, or, at least, of foreign origin. Let me assure my American friends that I am not referring to this in tones of reproach, from the merest suspicion of which, by the way, the tenour of my prefatory observations should be a protection. The fact that American orchestral music is in the hands of foreigners cannot possibly be ignored here, because it properly determines the scope and nature of what I have to say. To treat that music as native in origin, and, therefore, as indicating American powers and possibilities, would manifestly be absurd. It is simply a German article transferred from the Fatherland to the New World, and it occupies my attention of right only as it presents a model to, and exerts an influence upon, the American people.

To speak of orchestral music in America is at once to discuss the position and work of Mr. Theodore Thomas, who towers like Saul the son of Kish, a head and shoulders above all his fellows. The standing of Mr. Thomas among his adopted countrymen is almost unique in itself, and quite unique as regards the wide range of his action and influence. Perhaps the nearest approach to it, on a much smaller scale, is that of Mr. Charles Hallé in our northern and north-western counties. Even as Mr. Hallé dominates almost absolutely the higher manifestations of music in the region of his efforts, so Mr. Theodore Thomas rules in the chief cities of the Northern and Western States. Making New York the centre and principal seat of his labours, he from time to time organises vast tours, extending over thousands of miles; his visit to each city being rightly regarded as the chief musical event of the local year. No artistic man in the land exerts a wider or more powerful influence. He sets the standard of orchestral excellence throughout the Union, and employs all his talent and prestige so to raise public taste as that it shall reach the level of classic art. The instrument with which he chiefly works to this end is an orchestra composed, I believe, exclusively of Germans. Over its members Mr. Thomas exercises absolute control, and he has, beyond doubt, succeeded in making them the creatures of his will in all that concerns their artistic labours. Much care and judgment must have been exercised in choosing these performers—the more, if only the materials ready to hand in America are drawn upon. With regard to the point in question, I omitted to gather information, but, looking at the high average of excellence, the chances are that Mr. Thomas obtains his most important artists from Europe. In any case, his baton rules an orchestra of which the best conductor in the world might be proud. I do not say that it is faultless; or that, on all points, it will bear comparison with similar bodies in the Old World. The wind instrument players are not of equal merit; the first flute, for example, being conspicuous for tone and skill, while the first oboe offers, in each respect, matter for criticism. Again, the violins sound thin and poor by comparison with the fine, sonorous "strings" of our best English orchestras. Defects such as these, however, are dwarfed when placed in the same field of view with an admirable ensemble. Mr. Thomas's orchestra plays with one mind and one soul. It does not suggest so much a congregation of units as one unit only, with no possibility of inter-divergence. The motto of the body might be that of the United States, "E pluribus unum." This invaluable quality of oneness is, as every amateur knows, the proof of a perfect orchestra, and to secure it every good conductor tries his best as far as opportunities allow. When Habeneck presided over the unrivalled band of the Conservatoire Concerts in Paris, he rehearsed every section separately—taking the first violins, for instance, and, on encountering a doubtful passage, causing it to be played by each man in succession, till the proper rendering had been individually mastered. I do not know that Mr. Thomas takes such microscopic pains as did the famous Parisian chef d'orchestre, but, by some means or other, he secures an almost equally good result. There are no two ideas or two methods in his band. Only one idea or one method prevails, and that is the idea or the method of Mr. Thomas himself. His men are machines plus the intelligence which enables them to understand the will of their chief. On one occasion, in New York, I had an opportunity of seeing Mr. Thomas at work with his orchestra. Let me here premise that it is the custom among our kinsmen to hold what are called "public rehearsals," in the fashion adopted at the Handel Festivals, and the chief provincial gatherings amongst ourselves. These are really performances under another name, though the conductor has the right to make corrections and actually to "rehearse" if he think proper. It is not to an occasion of this kind that I now refer. The doors of Steinway Hall were very jealously guarded, indeed, when they opened, with ready courtesy, to the English stranger, who found himself alone in the auditorium. Among the works in preparation for a forthcoming Concert was Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, the rehearsal of which enabled me to form a tolerably accurate opinion of the conductor's method, and not only of that but of his thoroughness. The

And who, since the above was written, has met with the characteristic reward of having her method burlesqued at the "Gaiety." Madame Hading ought to feel highly flattered at being thus subjected by Mr. Burnand to the same treatment as Shakspere.

Symphony in A major was, of course, perfectly familiar to the executants, who could have played no small part of it with closed eyes. Yet Mr. Thomas rehearsed the well-known movements as carefully as though none of them had ever been heard before; devoting attention to the faintest shade of nuance and the execution of the most trifling appoggiatura, not less than to those broader features which an audience would be likely to note. Herein was revealed the secret of the Thomas orchestra. Among the many definitions of genius is one describing it as "the faculty of taking pains." Accepting this, I may say with perfect truth that genius has built up the success of the organisation under notice. I was struck with another feature-the perfect discipline of the orchestra. Every man gave patient attention to his work, permitting no distraction, and showing no restiveness as passages were tried again and again. Germans, perhaps, are specially amenable to discipline. They go through military service, in which, for three years, they are taught, with exceeding authority, that they must have no will of their own. Moreover, when a nation is carefully policed by a paternal government for generations, its habits of obedience ripen almost into an instinct. The Englishman, on the other hand, not having a paternal government and not being forced to attend a national disciplinary school, is apt to assert his personal liberty at inconvenient moments, and to show a want of respect for the office of his superiors. Readers of musical literature are familiar with stories about the unruliness of English orchestras-how they saddened Spohr, and brought tears of vexation into Mendelssohn's eyes. They are better now, it is true, thanks to the firmness with which the late Sir Michael Costa grappled with and suppressed a formidable evil. Mr. Thomas's manner with his orchestra reminded me somewhat of Sir Michael's. There was the same quiet firmness, and the same impression of devotion to the work in hand. Hence the rehearsal-a long one-proceeded in the most orderly fashion to its close. But when the word of dismissal had been uttered, Mr. Thomas's well disciplined men resembled a lot of boys let loose from school. The noise of their tongues, and the quickness of their dispersal showed how great had been the demand upon time and patience. I attended the Philharmonic Concert for which the rehearsal above spoken of was a preparation, and found the Hall crowded with a brilliant audience who seemed to take a considerable degree of interest in the music presented. I am distinctly one of those who entertain a poor opinion of the classical taste of New Yorkers as regards the "divine" art. In such a mass of human beings, however, there must be a percentage of cultured amateurs, and the Philharmonic Concerts appear to enjoy the patronage of such persons in full measure. Madame Fursch-Madier was the vocalist, and the entire performance ranked as high as anything we have in Europe.

In this connection I desire to touch upon a fact well worthy of comment. Mr. Thomas's programmes, though distinguished by a large number of classical selections, contain also what English amateurs belonging to the ultra-modern school, such as the compositions of Wagner, Liszt, and their compeers. I do not know if these works represent the eminent conductor's personal taste. He has probably drilled himself into the position of an eclectic, and is equally happy whether, on the side of Paul, pleading with the Gentiles, or, on the side of Peter, arguing with the Jews. One fact is pretty clear—Mr. Thomas would not devote so much attention to modern works if his public had not a special ear for them. The brother. In my opinion, the choral performance of supply is so profuse that I am bound to believe in a "St. Paul," though it might have been the best New demand. According to the predilections of him who observes the fact in question will be the conclusion drawn from it. Some will at once argue that American taste for the ultra-romantic and sensational school proves advanced culture. This was the line conspicuously taken by a New York critic during my stay in the Empire City. Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" had just been performed, under circumstances presently to be stated, and, I am sorry to say, the gentleman in question heard that oratorio with anything but admiration and pleasure. He wrote about it bitterly, and, if I may be permitted to say so, with as little regard for his own critical reputation as respect for an illustrious composer. To him "St. Paul" was dull and antiquated. "It" might do," he remarked, "for the thousands who flock to the Albert Hall, in London, but cannot pass with a public so enlightened as that of New York"the public who furiously applaud Liszt's Symphonic Poems, and such pieces as Wagner's Valkyrie Ride. Here we have one view of the case. For my own part, I should present quite another, and say that the partiality of the American public for sensational music shows the state of mind that precedes rather than follows culture. The young child prefers colour to form, and turns its eyes instinctively towards anything that glitters. The boy loves romantic and blood-curdling stories, without a thought for any question of art in their telling. It is only the trained and experienced man that goes behind mere outward manifestations and appeals to the nerve-centres, and is dissatisfied if he find nothing there. The purely sensuous effects which distinguish much ultra-romantic music, so far from being art itself, are scarcely essential adjuncts. Art, in its highest form -as we have it, for example, in Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony and in the orchestral movements of Beethoven's Ninth—stands wholly separate from such effects. Instead, therefore, of arguing an "advanced" taste from partiality for the ultraromantic, I should arrive at a conclusion exactly opposite, and say that it signifies an elementary condition of musical life-"pleased with a rattle, tickled with a straw."

I have referred to a performance of "St. Paul," given, let me now add, by the New York Oratorio Society, under the direction of the late Dr. Damrosch, at a time when that ill-fated gentleman was struggling with the very arduous duties of his position as chef d'orchestre at the German opera. It is necessary to have in mind the strain to which Dr. Damrosch subjected himself, because this may account for features in the performance which a conductor, under circumstance of greater leisure, would have guarded against. The Concert in question was the only important orchestral and choral display I had an opportunity of witnessing in the Northern States -unless I except a small part of Dvorák's "Stabat Mater," given in my hearing by the orchestra and chorus of Mr. Theodore Thomas. Happily, the New York Oratorio Society may be taken as a fairly representative body, filling a position akin to that of our own Sacred Harmonic Society or the Society would regard as an unusual proportion of works connected with the Albert Hall. In this conclusion I am strengthened by a New York critic who said, referring to the presentation of "St. Paul": "The chorus of the Society is still by far the most efficient in New York." This writer further remarked: "It gives forth a splendid volume of tone; its members are perfectly responsive to Dr. Damrosch's bâton, and their attack, general precision, and shading, last evening, did them infinite credit." I am reluctantly compelled to join issue here with my Transatlantic York could furnish, was a very poor and inadequate The singers made an imposing appearance, so numerous were they, but the tone they produced was by no means in proportion, and I fear that a strict chorus-master would reject no small percentage of them as dummies or incom-Their work was done, moreover, in a limp and invertebrate manner, with a weak "attack," and little heart. The reader will understand that I am judging from one hearing. It may have been that "St. Paul" did not excite their enthusiasm, and was approached languidly. Apropos, the critic last quoted said: "Regarded in its entirety, 'St. Paul' is rather a solemn work to be chosen as the attraction of a Concert. Its sustained pathos and gravity, and the comparative simplicity of its dramatic passages cause it to appear monotonous in comparison with the lovely variety of music in 'The Creation' and the powerful strains of 'The Messiah.'" Without stopping to marvel at this opinion, let me take it as another indication of the feeling which Young Germany has fostered in America against Mendelssohn, whom it is the fashion to decry, à la Wagner, as a drawing-room composer. Perhaps Dr. Damrosch's chorus shared this sentiment. I know not, but I do know that scant justice was done to "St. Paul." The orchestra, though containing some good players, lacked the important qualifications which give dis-tinction to that presided over by Mr. Theodore Thomas. It was rough, and deficient in both delicacy and precision. All the solo vocalists were American, though the names of two-Heinrich and Toedtproclaimed a Teutonic origin. Mr. Heinrich sang well, but the others would, in England, stand little chance of appearing at a first-class Concert. Concerning Dr. Damrosch as a conductor, I speak in full view of the adage, "De mortuis," &c. He struck me as a man of peculiarly nervous organisation, and, on that account, perhaps, unable to preserve the calm coup d'ail so essential to the perfect control of a large and half-disciplined body.

I much regret that no opportunity was afforded me of hearing the famous Handel and Haydn Society of Boston-a body which, according to information I readily credit, preserves in America the true traditions of oratorio, and keeps its performance at a proper standard. I can believe anything good of the cultured metropolis of New England. An Englishman, by the way, is hardly able to avoid this form of faith. In Boston he sees so much reminding him of his own land—so marked an illustration of the Greater Britain which reproduces all the world over the Britain called Great, that he cannot refuse his sym-Besides the Handel and Haydn Society, Boston is the home of several musical "clubs," as our cousin calls societies, preserving an old English word in a sense we have almost lost. I was permitted to attend the rehearsals of two of these associations. namely, the Boylston Club, a body of mixed voices, conducted by Mr. Osgood, and the Apollo Club (male voices). The singing of the Boylston Club gave me much satisfaction, but I was not at all surprised by its excellence after observing the manner and method of Mr. Osgood, who seemed to me the ideal of a chorus-master, firm in his requirements, gentle in enforcing them, able to indicate clearly what he wanted by speech and song, and painstaking enough not to leave off till he had got it. Mr. Osgood met the ladies of the club some time before the gentlemen were required, and rehearsed with them several pieces for female voices only. The effect was charming, the tone being fresh and pure, and the execution of each work marked by the unity and refinement, as well as accuracy, upon which the Director, in his quiet but uncompromising way, lost no opportunity a gathering with a higher purpose than show. In of insisting. Not less admirable was the effect of mixed voices, and I can readily believe that the practices of the Boylston Club are accounted by its members amongst their most valuable means of musical grace. As a stranger I was delighted with the abundant evidence they afforded of refinement

The Apollo Club, if I may be permitted to judge upon very slight acquaintance, scarcely equals the Boylston in the niceties of executive art. The singing on the night of my attendance was a little rough; nevertheless the effects produced were often very fine, thanks to the good voices of the members and the enthusiasm they brought to their work. Some of the second basses were magnificent in depth and volume. This, indeed, appeared the best section of a choir which, taken for all in all, reminded me of a first-rate Yorkshire chorus more than any body of voices I met with in America. Could the singers of Leeds or Bradford have heard the Boston Apollos, there would have been instant fraternisation on the basis of full musical brotherhood. The capital of New England boasts two other clubs—the Orchestral and the St. Cecilia. With neither of these had I an opportunity of making acquaintance during my brief stay in the city; but as regards the St. Cecilians, I learn, at second hand, that they do not tolerate amongst themselves an absolute and complete refinement. A witness against them in this respect is the specially-prepared English libretto of Mendelssohn's "Wedding of Camacho," not long ago performed. It abounds in Americanisms, such as "She has gone back on him," but the synopsis contains some of the richest examples of a novel style. Here are a few choice extracts:-

"He tells Camacho that Basilio has inherited a fortune, and that Carrasco is going to marry Quiteria to Basilio after all, because of his greater wealth. This falls through."

"He gets them all out in the night to the wild cave of Montesinos, out of which Basilio bawls sepul-chral warnings to Camacho to let Quiteria alone. This does not work either.

"When the marriage is just going to be performed, he has Basilio commit suicide with a slip dagger. Shocked at the scene, the men let Quiteria be married to the dying man, intending to marry her over again when he shall stop breathing. Basilio jumps up all right. The Alcalde, from a bribe, and old Don Quixote, from chivalry, uphold the marriage. Camacho hath no stomach for a fight, so they all go to dinner.'

The "Wedding of Camacho" is a comic opera, but it cannot be absolutely necessary to back up its humour with language worthy of the funny reporter.

The only orchestra that came under my observation in Boston was that lately directed by Herr Henschel, and at present conducted by Herr Gericke. It is a body composed almost entirely—perhaps I should say exclusively-of Germans, and maintains its frequent Concerts in a large measure through the liberality of a wealthy amateur, whose devotion to the art reminds one of the princely patrons of old. I attended one of the performances under Herr Gericke's bâton in the noble Music Hall, of which Boston is justly proud. There was a large and intelligent audience, evidently made up from many classes of people—if there be more than one class in so democratic a land. I was struck with the businesslike aspect of the Hall, the idea conveyed being not that of a dress fête, but of an ordinary occasion for which ordinary attire sufficed. The scene, therefore, was not what we in England sometimes call "brilliant." It appealed rather to mental recognition of platform, he himself mounting a rostrum to command them, and becoming much more conspicuous than a conductor ever ought to be. Othello, according to one of his attendants, loved "music that may not be heard." Similarly, I should prefer conductors that are never seen; a gesticulating person right before the eye being, besides an absurd, a distracting spectacle. German Chefs d'orchestre, unhappily, cling to the level platform and their own "bad eminence" with a firmness worthy of a better cause. The Boston orchestra falls far short, numerically, of that presided over by Mr. Thomas, but it is large enough for all reasonable purposes, and contains a lot of good men, fit, like Wellington's Peninsular troops, to go anywhere and do anything." This was clearly shown by the performance of the overture to "Die Zauberflöte"-a very fair test-piece, as all amateurs know. I can honestly say that I never heard a better rendering of Mozart's work either in England or on the Continent. It had wonderful qualities of precision, delicacy, and shading—was, in fact, as good as it could be. Some of the Boston critics, I observed, complained of the tempo as too fast. On that point I was unable to agree with them. Gericke took the overture at precisely the rate of speed to which we in Europe are accustomed. The speed to which we in Europe are accustomed. The next two pieces in the programme were, I regret to say, arrangements, by Franz and Reinecke respectively, of Bach's Pastoral ("Christmas Oratorio"), and Schumann's "Oriental Pictures" (Op. 66)—these last having, as I need scarcely add, been written for the pianoforte. Why the conductor elected to present perversions instead of legitimate orchestral navie it is impressible to incompare without orchestral music it is impossible to imagine without thinking hard things of his taste. The Boston critics spoke sharply on the matter, and they were right. Gade's "Ossian" overture and Beethoven's Symphony, No. 2, completed the programme. In the Danish master's work, as in that of Mozart, the orchestra appeared to great advantage, giving an interpretation which faithfully conveyed the spirit of the music as well as its form. The Beethoven Symphony, on the other hand, showed a falling off, its performance leaving something to desire in various respects. Taken as a whole, the Concert deserved high rank, and Boston should be glad and grateful that a spirited citizen gives such opportunities for culture of the best class.

It falls properly without the scope of these remarks to dwell upon the lectures which form so peculiar and conspicuous a feature of Boston musical life. During the past winter, no fewer than three professors were thus teaching the public; one of them-Professor Paine-taking his audience through the history of music from its earliest period. The attendance on these occasions was quite large, and a healthy

There remains yet to speak of orchestral and choral music in Chicago—a place of which I have most pleasant memories. My remarks upon art in the Lake City must be reserved for another paper.

THE GREAT COMPOSERS

By Joseph Bennett.

It is now time to answer the question whether Gluck's letter to M. le Bailli du Roullet, ascribing the music of "Les Danaïdes" to Salieri, was a forgery or not. Acting upon impulse, an honest man might answer affirmatively, declining to believe that so respectable a personage as Gluck would lend mark the climax of one of the most impudent epistles his name to a work with which he had had nothing ever penned. Not only does it claim credit for an German fashion, Gericke had his men on a level to do beyond giving advice-would, in short, become party to something very like fraud upon the public, and only proclaim the truth when every advantage resulting from its suppression had been gained. The weight of evidence shows, nevertheless, that Gluck was mixed up to some extent in a transaction the reverse of creditable, though, no doubt, he took part more through a friendly regard for Salieri than for any less worthy reason. There is this to be said, moreover—the letter proclaiming the true authorship of "Les Danaïdes" was dated April 26, yet it did not appear in the Fournal de Paris till May 15, the opera being allowed to sail under false colours during the intervening three weeks. Why was the letter thus kept back by its recipient, Du Roullet? Fétis gives an answer, which, if correct, darkens the transaction very much.

If Gluck's letter did not appear till May 16, but slept in the pocket of Bailli du Roullet, the reason appears to have been that Deslouriers (the publisher) so stipulated. On this point, Fétis remarks in the second edition of his "Biographie des Musiciens":-

"I have seen the act of sale in which the publisher engaged to pay 1,200 livres on the condition that Gluck's name remained in the bills till the thirteenth representation. It was on the very morning of that representation that a letter from Gluck appeared in the papers, declaring that Salieri was the sole author of the music. The direction of the Opéra paid him 10,000 francs for the work, besides 3,000 francs for travelling expenses, and the Queen made him a rich present.

The act of sale referred to became, we are told, the property of Imbault, another publisher, in the hands of whose successors-Janet and Cotelle-it was when Fétis saw it. Further evidence incriminating Salieri appears in a report of the Opéra Directors to the Government concerning their sitting of Jan. 5, 1784.

In that document we read:-

"The committee, subject to the approval of the minister, contracted with M. Salieri, as representing M. le Chevalier Gluck, to give as a first novelty at the opening of the house at Easter, the Opera 'Les Danaïdes,' and to pay M. Salieri, after the third representation of that work, the sum of 12,000 livres from the chest of the Académie Royale de Musique, thus, as has been agreed, fully acquitting themselves towards MM. Gluck, Salieri, and all others, as regards the rights and honorariums of the authors of words and music."

From the foregoing, without attempting to reconcile every detail, we can gather that Salieri at any rate traded very successfully on a fraud. Let us now see how he behaved when the publication of Gluck's letter exposed the whole transaction. He sent the following communication to the papers:-

"M. le Chevalier Gluck's declaration, which I have just read in your journal, is a new favour bestowed by that great man; whose friendship reflects upon me a ray of his own glory. It is true that I alone wrote the music of 'Les Danaïdes,' but I did so entirely under his direction, guided by his light, and illuminated by his genius. The merit of the musical ideas is too ordinary and too small to feed any one's vanity. It is the use made of them, their application to the words, their dramatic course, which constitutes all their value, and gives them real merit. All that is good in this regard in the opera I owe to the author of 'Iphigénie.' I should, then, have been false to truth and gratitude, if I had not profited by the honour which he extended to me of associating his name with mine at the head of the work."

The italics in the above quotation are ours. They

Gluck remained quietly in Vienna all through the "Danaides" incident, and after; writing little and resting on laurels which, it is said, he jealously guarded. It has often been charged againt him that he viewed the rise of Mozart with feelings which, to say the least, were unsympathetic. This accusation, however, breaks down upon enquiry into facts. It is true that Mozart's father, writing in 1768, speaks of Gluck's envy, and betrays some irritation against the great man. But whenever Gluck met the composer of "Don Giovanni," he showed nothing save admiration and good will. He was present at the first performance of the Parisian Symphony, and Mozart himself says in a letter to his father: "Gluck had the box next to the Langes, in which was also my wife. He could not praise enough either the symphony or the song, and he invited us all to dinner next Sunday." Again, referring to his "Entführung, he wrote: "My opera (by Gluck's desire) was given again yesterday, Gluck was very complimentary to me about it. I dine with him to-morrow." This certainly does not look like mean jealousy, or strengthen in any way the charge brought by the elder Mozart against Gluck, when he indicts him for having helped to quash a proposed performance of his son's "La Finta simplice" at the Imperial Court, That Gluck was superior to the ordinary considerations which affect humanity no one will be absurd enough to say. Perhaps he did view with some alarm the advent of a genius like Mozart; but he allowed admiration rather than fear to influence his bearing towards the younger master.

Full of years and honours, Gluck spent the closing period of his life in the Alte Wiedenstrasse, near St. Paul's Church, occasionally visiting a country house he had purchased at Berchtholdsdorf, not far from the capital. At both places he played the grand seigneur to some effect; dressing always in the fashion, wearing an embroidered coat on fête days, and cultivating towards strangers and dependents a somewhat haughty demeanour. This, however, he imposed upon himself, for he was at heart a "good fellow," and amongst friends, especially when warmed by a little wine, he knew how to keep the table in a roar. He was visited at Berchtholdsdorf, in 1783, by Reichärd, who has given a lively account of the reception and Gluck's subsequent behaviour. Believing that he was about to see merely a simple musician, Reichärd wore his travelling dress, and found himself presently confronted by an imposing old man in a grey coat richly embroidered with silver, otherwise perfectly dressed and surrounded by servants. At table the hauteur of the master of the house soon disappeared; Gluck talked rapidly and well, and at the close of the meal insisted on going to the piano and singing to his guest some of the music (now lost), he had long before written to the odes in Klopstock's "Hermannschlacht." After a while the subject of Paris came up; then Gluck showed himself less good-tempered, poured out upon the Parisians and France the vials of sarcasm and irony. So deeply had the failure of "Echo et Narcisse" entered into his soul.

We come now to the master's last work. This was a piece entitled "Le Jugement dernier," written to French words by Roger, for the Apollo Society. In this case, also, he collaborated with Salieri. The following particulars appear in M. Desnoiresterres's "Gluck et Piccinni": "In a certain place trumpets and drums announce the end of the world; the people express their despair and remorse in chorus. At the light. moment when they cry 'Where shail we fly? Where The shall we hide?' the instrumental effect rises to a paroxysm. But all at once a sweet melody announces the approach of the Saviour, who, in a slow recitative, accompanied only by a few chords, calls the elect to His side and repulses the sinners. A double chorus follows, in which the saved proclaim their happiness, and the others give vent to their fury; the contrast being treated with infinite art, and the whole ending in most grandiose fashion. . . . Gluck long considered how Christ should be brought in. He put the question to Salieri, who could not answer 'Ah! well,' said the master, 'I will go in a few days and ascertain for myself."

Gluck had a presentiment at this time that his life was approaching its end. Two attacks of paralysis had fallen upon him, taking away the use of his right arm and leg, a third following in the autumn of 1786. This, for a while, deprived him of speech, and permanently clouded his intellect, confusing memory, and causing him to mix up his ideas strangely. It is said that when taking leave of Salieri, who was about to revisit Paris, he spoke in three different languages: "Ainsi, mon cher ami-lei parti domani per Parigi-je vous souhaite-di cuore un bon voyage -Sie gehen in eine Stadt, wo man die fremden Küntsler schatzt-e lei farà onore ich Zweitle nicht." Then, embracing his friend, he added, "Ci scriva, mais bien souvent."

biographer last quoted:-

"On November 15, 1787, the master received two friends just come from Paris, at his house in the Alte Wieden. Every day, after dinner, the Chevalier took a carriage drive by medical order, to breathe fresher air and enjoy a little movement. Coffee and wine were on the table, and Madame Gluck, having served the two visitors, retired for the purpose of ordering the horses to be put to. While she was away, her husband, seeing that one of his friends allowed the wine to remain untouched, seized the glass and drank it off at a draught; afterwards humorously begging everybody not to tell his wife, wine being rigorously forbidden to him. Madame Gluck came back; the carriage was ready; she desired her guests to excuse them, and await their return in the garden. In half-an-hour's time the carriage hastily re-appeared. Gluck had received another stroke, and all hope was lost. In vain they tried to rouse him; he expired without recovering consciousness, at the age of seventy-three years. Two days later, November 17, the remains were buried at the Matzleinsdorf cemetery, in presence of a great crowd of friends and admirers."

A stone was put over the grave, bearing the following inscription: "Here lies an honest German, a good Christian, and a faithful husband. Christoph Chevalier Gluck, master in the art of music. Died November 15, 1787." Madame Gluck followed her husband in 1800, and received a much longer epitaph; "Here rests, by the side of her spouse, Marie-Anna Elde de Gluck, born Pergin. She was a good Christian, and secretly the mother of the poor. Loved and appreciated by all who knew her, she ended her life at the age of seventy-one, not without having generously recompensed those who merited it. She died March 12, 1800. This monument has been erected by her grateful nephew, Carl von Gluck, in witness of his deep veneration." The graves were neglected, and as the stones in course of time became moss-grown, all knowledge of the composer's resting place was lost till (1844) careful search was made, and the inscriptions, cleaned by some Viennese Old Mortality, brought again to

The following is a translation of Gluck's will:-

"As nothing is more certain than death, or more uncertain than the time of it, I, the undersigned, being in the full possession of all my faculties, give my last instructions as thus:—

"I. I commend my soul to the infinite mercy of God; my body to be interred according to the rites of the Holy Catholic Church.

"II. I bequeath the sum of twenty-five florins for fifty masses for my soul.

"III. I bequeath to the poor-house one florin; to the general hospital one florin; to the burgher hospital one florin; to the normal school one florin—four florins in all.

"IV. Further, I bequeath to each of my domestics still in my service at the time of my death one year's wages.

"V. I leave it entirely to the will and pleasure of my heir general to give anything to my brothers and

"VI. As the fundamental principle of every will is the appointment of an heir, I hereby appoint my dear wife, M. Anna von Gluck, née Bergin, as my sole and exclusive heir; and that no doubts may arise as to whether the silver and other personal property be mine or my wife's, I hereby also deciare all the silver and other valuables to be the sole property of my wife, and consequently not included in my previous bequests. Should, however, this my last will and testament not prove valid, I hope that it may be considered legal as a codicil. Lastly, I appoint my highly-esteemed cousin, Joseph von Holbein, Royal Hofrath, executor to this my will, and I bequeath to him a snuff-box as a remembrance.-Signed and wit-"CHRISTOPH VON GLUCK." nessed, &c.,

The third clause of this remarkable document has sorely puzzled the master's biographers, some of whom ask whether it be an epigram of a peculiarly untimely kind. Others demand, "If Gluck left no more to the poor, why so much?" Yet others believe that the clause, inserted in good faith, proves the illiberality of the composer's nature. Our readers will form their own conclusions on a not very satis-

Gluck died a rich man, for one in his position. Besides his two houses, he possessed a large number of bonds, and an immense quantity of valuable presents. In 1779, he deposited in one bank 12,500 florins, and 9,000 in another, for all of which he received interest at the rate of eight per cent. It is estimated that from all sources Madame Gluck enjoyed an annual income of 30,000 florins after her husband's death. Let us add that from Paris alone the composer drew nearly 200,000 livres by the sale of his works and in the form of salaries and pensions.

This brief record of Gluck's life cannot end better than with a translation of the letter written to a Parisian journal by his old opponent Piccinni, as soon as the news of his death arrived.

"Gentlemen, I do not write to you now in order to utter an eulogium on the great composer whose death you have just announced. The musical war of which that famous man and myself were the origin, but of which he was not the victim, would cause eulogy to be suspected by those who know me only through my works or by my name. It is for you, the historians of that war, and of the musical revolution which it wrought in France, worthily to praise the man to whom your lyric theatre owes as much as the French stage to Corneille.

"I venture to propose for the Chevalier Gluck a homage which shall last longer than marble, and convey to latest posterity, not the features, but the image of the genius to whom art and France owe honour. I propose to found, in memory of Chevalier Gluck, an annual concert, to take place on the anniversary of his death, and be limited exclusively to his music. Such an institution appears to me most worthy to consecrate the memory of Gluck. Moreover, it would have the advantage of serving, after his death, the art which, in life, he so brilliantly professed.

"You know that art-which, perhaps, owes its charms to its mobility, and which necessitates, I venture to say, a measure of inconstancy in its forms -changes in a nation in proportion as it is brought to perfection. Perhaps the want of variety which has corrupted the art of Italy will not affect yours, and you will make music, in forty years, nowise resembling that which now gives us pleasure. The institution I propose will recall our composers to the principles of the art, and the kind of truth which music exacts. The grand models left by Gluck will preserve among those who succeed him the character and the form of dramatic music which particularly constituted the genius of the great composer.

"Such are, gentlemen, the thoughts that have led me to propose my project. If it appears to you capable of execution; if the Sovereign, who protected that illustrious man, and his rivals, deigns to receive it, I beg the public to permit me to devote the last accents of a voice about to become silent to the talents of a man of genius, whose death excites in me no other sentiment than a desire to immortalise the memory of a composer, the name of whom marks the revolution which has been effected in the best theatres of Europe."

A SECOND "WAVERLEY" TALE.

More than sixty years ago, there lived a young and ambitious composer. What his name was, or where he dwelt, does not matter for the moment. Like the father of Edward Waverley, in Scott's famous story, he "saw no practical road to independence save that of relying on his own exertions."
He studied the operas of his predecessors and also those of his contemporaries, but he had theories of his own with respect to dramatic music, and these he determined to put into practice. Those whom we now call the "old masters" were then young! Our composer, like many since his time, seemed to think that following exactly in their path was useless, and that he had better attempt to strike out a new one for himself. At least his course was probably determined partly by reflection, partly by inspiration. will very much simplify matters if we at once say that his ideas were very similar to those which Wagner, twenty or more years later, so fully expounded and illustrated. He wrote an opera which certainly met with success, but the story of the libretto was an exciting one, and took the fancy of the public. He had friends too, and they may have helped to create a momentary interest in the work. But the score of his opera one day comes under the notice of a writer living in a foreign country. It is read, studied, and criticised by him. The overture written accord-Italy has just consecrated more than an eulogium to ling to Gluck's plan foreshadowed the events of the the memory of Sacchini. Florence has decreed him a bust in her gallery. Rome has placed an image of this piece. "Its chief merit," he says, "does not that great composer in the Pantheon, and the marble consist in the selection of the passages on which it is reproduces before the eyes of a people who really formed, so much as in their judicious and effective structure." And again :- " In the overture the composer shadows out with a mysterious but masterly hand the ground-work of his story." Thus his first impression seems to have been a very favourable one. But our critic on turning over the pages of the opera comes across passages alloted to the voice, "which cannot be called vocal, and which sound harsh and unpleasing in the ears of polished judgment and fine taste" (his own, of course). And he is alarmed to find solos for the principals "partaking more of the character of recitative than of air"; indeed in some places he considers the composer has left the principals "so small a share in the general effect, that, instead of being the principals, they become merely subordinates." There is scarcely an air in the whole opera which he can praise in an unqualified manner, he meets with too much unvocal writing, too many chromatic and enharmonic modifications of the scale, too many difficult passages. One air he likes because it approaches to the modern Italian style; another, because the instrumental parts are not suffered at any time to eclipse the singer. But now let us hear what he has to say about the orchestra. It is the old accusation over again that Grétry made against Mozart of putting the pedestal (the orchestra) on the stage. Our critic is never tired of praising the brilliancy, the effectiveness, the power, and the cleverness of the orchestral accompaniments, but the superiority allotted to them appears to him a very serious drawback.

We must not, by partial quotation, misrepresent our author's meaning. The "novel style of writing" troubles him, and while condemning in no sparing terms what he considers the failings of the work, he is sincerely anxious to do it justice. He is aware that the opera "is not to be considered simply as a musical composition"; he wishes to take the composer "as he paces within the circle he has drawn"; he is of opinion that unless the work is studied and seen "the beauties are lost." All this shows he had carefully reflected over the work and also that he had gained some insight into the composer's method; but yet he regards the whole as a mistake, as an extravagant effort of talent, or even, in the words of a philosophical friend whom he quotes, as an "out-

Soon after writing this notice, this same critic, or someone holding pretty similar opinions, has the misfortune to listen to a concert performance of this opera and writes as follows: "If we had before believed that the music of this opera was purely dramatic, and with the exception of the overture, depended on its connection with the mystical structure of the opera for effect, we were more than ever convinced of the justice of such a judgment from the result of this concert. Nearly all that was not irresistibly ridiculous, was supremely dull." And again, "The audience could with difficulty sit out the performance."

Our tale is at an end, and if perchance any readers have followed it thus far, the writer would ask them if they have guessed the name of the composer. He fancies some would say "Yes; your 'sixty years since' is a myth, and you have been giving us extracts from a notice of one of Wagner's music-dramas, possibly 'Parsifal'; for your account of the Concert specially seems to refer to the Albert Hall performance last year of that work." Then he would reply that the guess is a wrong one. Certainly, the remarks and style of criticism of which he has given a few specimens resemble much that is said about Wagner at the present day, but he has been quoting from a review really written more than sixty years ago on Weber's "Der founded with the slur, no doubt in the course of his Freyschütz." The "foreign country" is England, the teaching he had encountered difficulties from the fact place of publication London.

How times have changed since the article from which we have quoted was written! The expressions no longer suit Weber's music, but, in the opinion of some, would fitly describe that of Wagner. We are naturally busy to-day with the things of to-day. Brahms's Fourth Symphony, Dvorák's new Cantata, or Mackenzie's new Opera will soon claim our special attention. But by occasionally looking back and seeing what strange views were once held about men whom we do not now deem extravagant we may perhaps learn a lesson or two, and accustom ourselves to detect more shrewdly signs of change, yet progress, than did some of our forefathers. Weber was not the only man misunderstood in his day. Beethoven's later works troubled the minds of his contemporaries. One writer, in a printed letter bearing date August 24, 1827, spoke of his having "mistaken noise for grandeur, extravagance for originality," and expressed a belief that in the future his elaborate compositions would be "talked of by professors and suffered to lie in peace on the shelves." So far as Beethoven and Weber are concerned, we may at any rate, like the Pharisee of old, give thanks that we are not unjust "as other men are," yet let us take care: for it is possible to repeat the mistakes of the past, but, of course, in another form.

THE following advertisements are clipped from the Times :-

Coaching for Examinations; also Preparatory Grounding.

Oxonian (married) Coaches Men for Responsions, Moderations, Divinity, Greats. Healthy country house. Good shooting, hunting-Terms for Coaching, Board, and Residence, 30s. weekly.

In the first of these advertisements the word "also" seems to show that the "preparatory grounding" is either an extra to be paid for separately, or that the pupil may or may not include this apparently insignificantitem in his course of study. The second one merely announces a "coaching" establishment, with country air, good shooting, and hunting. Now, if it be really true that the most "examined" country is the worst "educated," may it not arise from the fact of the "coach" too often supplanting the "teacher?" In executive musical examinations it is true that superficial talent can scarcely be disguised; but when we read in the papers that "a young lady requires a Coach for a few months to prepare her for a Harmony Examination," it is evident that the advertiser has but little desire to study, and indeed would be too glad if she could pass a pianoforte or singing examination by the same means. True it is that those who "coach" pupils for University examina-tions must have a very good knowledge of all the necessary subjects themselves; but it is not essential that they should convey more of that knowledge to their pupils than is absolutely called for; and that this fact is equally applicable to musical "coaches" is evident to all who have considered the subject. The examinations in music now spreading rapidly over the country are effecting much good, but care must be taken that "passing" is not made too easy. It is of the utmost importance that the solid acquirements of the pupil should be accurately ascertained; and if the skill of the "coach," therefore, can baffle the efforts of the examiner, it will become necessary for the examiner to consider how he can effectually use his skill to baffle the efforts of the "coach."

WHEN Sterndale Bennett, years ago, endeavoured, in his published compositions, to substitute a modified sign for the bind, in order that it should not be conof the curved line representing two distinct meanings. Had he pursued his reform further, there can be little cause of much nervousness with inexperienced question that he would in very many cases have dispensed with the slur altogether; for certainly of all musical characters this is the one least necessary. In the first place, as legato playing is understood to be the rule, it must fairly be presumed that the exception only should be marked; and, if so, what can be the reason for drawing a slur over long passages and omitting it over others which are always played in precisely the same manner? Of course when a slur is written over two notes they are performed like a word of two syllables with the accent on the first; but over a short passage of three or four notes the slur is absolutely useless. In exemplification of the truth of our remarks, let us turn to the last movement of Beethoven's Sonata in G, Op. 14, No. 2, as it is usually printed. If the many passages left without slurs are to be played legato, why does a slur appear over any; and where the subject in C major occurs, would not the first four bars be played exactly as the composer intended were there no slur save upon the two quavers F sharp, G? Again, in the twenty-fifth bar from the commencement of the C major subject, unquestionably the sforzando E flat in the left hand is to be joined to the following D, and yet the slur ends upon the E flat, the similar passage for the right hand (with the E natural) which occurs before this, usually having no slur at all. We could of course multiply instances of the absurd use of this sign—amongst which might be cited those where the slur terminates at the end of the bar, instead of at the end of the passage—but trust that we have said enough to draw attention to a subject which we happen to know, by the many enquiries from perplexed correspondents, has caused, and is still causing, much confusion amongst amateur pianists.

It has been often said that the study and pursuit of art keeps you young; and as it is a thoroughly ascertained fact that one of the healthiest professions is that of music, this at least is one confirmation of the truth of the assertion. But not only is the practice of music favourable to the longevity of the artist himself, but it is highly beneficial to all who come habitually within its influence; and many instances might even be adduced where its power of interesting and soothing a nervously organised patient has exerted a magical effect, when all conventional medical remedies have completely failed. In proof that doctors who have the charge of those mentally affected are gradually recognising music as an important curative agent, we cite the following advertisement from an asylum, which recently appeared in our own columns: "Female Attendant Wanted, who must possess a good soprano voice, and be able to read music." Certainly the salary offered for this office-£17 per annum, including board and uniform -could scarcely secure an attendant with a "good soprano voice"; but we may reasonably imagine that as the demand for assistants with musical qualifications at such asylums increase, the remuneration will be raised, and eventually that Concerts without any exterior aid will be constantly given in the institutions, under the supervision of the medical superintendent. Of all the recreations devised for insane patients there can be no question that this is the very best; and we are glad therefore to record so decisive a step in the right direction.

executants; yet we cannot but think that more of this unfortunate failing arises from a slight misgiving, when playing or singing before acknowledged judges, as to whether your teaching has been sufficiently in the right direction to ensure passing so severe an ordeal. "My daughter is an accomplished artist," thinks a fond mother, "because all her friends say so"; but the question is whether the daughter herself believes this. In many cases we think not; and if even a lingering doubt upon the matter exists, there can be little wonder that when removed from the circle of her "friends," she feels that for the first time she is placed upon her real trial. We have been led into making these remarks by reading a paragraph in an American musical journal, which informs us that a lady "has organised a 'Confidence Musical Club,' the purpose of which is to aid the young ladies who belong to it to gain confidence to play in public." We are curious to know by what process this is effected. If the young ladies are to gain confidence to play in public by playing in public, we can scarcely understand why they should not at once endeavour to procure a concert engagement; and if the audience is to be a private one, we do not see the benefit of the club, for the pupils can subject themselves to this test at home. At all events, it will be necessary for the hearers and performers never to change places, or there will be a danger of the "Confidence Club" developing into a "Mutual Admiration Society."

Acting upon a suggestion made by their enterprising Secretary, Mr. Ellis, Messrs. Spiers and Pond inaugurated at the Criterion, some four months ago, a species of entertainment which, under the capable direction of Mr. Richard Mackway, has already reached a high level of efficiency. A well chosen and constantly varied programme of glees, partsongs, madrigals, &c., is performed every evening, in the Grand Hall, by a choir of eleven boys and half-a-dozen men, with a degree of precision and verve affording ample proof of the careful training to which the Conductor has subjected the forces at his disposal. When we add that, in case of the boys, these forces were practically raw material last December, the extent of his services will be better understood. A special selection of sacred music, drawn chiefly from the works of Handel and Mendelssohn, was arranged for performance on the evening of Good Friday; and, in the face of any à priori objections on the score of the incongruity of such a proceeding, it is only fair to state that, a secular programme being impossible under the conditions of their licence, the management had to choose between sacred music or none at all, and that the excellence of the performance was obviously appreciated by the audience. The powers of the boys were put to a crucial test in a choral from Bach's "Passion" music (St. Matthew), from which they emerged with credit; and Mr. Richard Evans rendered the tenor solo in an anthem by Zingarelli in such style as to give the best evidence of the value of the training he has undergone at the hands of Mr. Mackway. A steady increase in the number of diners at the table d'hôte in the Grand Hall attests the popularity of an entertainment which we believe to be unique at the present day in London.

We desire to draw attention to a paragraph in our THE remark of an eminent teacher that "nervous- present number respecting a series of Services of Praise given within the past twelve months at the sant truth, even if it be admitted as truth at all. No church of St. Peter's, Ellastone, Staffordshire, the doubt the intense desire to do yourself thorough plan of which is, we believe, novel, and the effect of justice in the rendering of a musical work is the which upon a congregation chiefly composed of working men, seems to have been in every respect thoroughly satisfactory. The services are illustrative of Christmas and Easter; and the music, selected from the works of the great masters, is set to appropriate scriptural texts. The design is extremely well carried out, and the hope is that this definite form of service may not only enlist the sympathies of the poorer classes, but lead them gradually to an appreciation of the more elaborate sacred compositions. Every credit must be given to the promoter of this undertaking; and we sincerely hope that he will receive that warm encouragement which is due to his painstaking and earnest efforts in the cause.

IT could scarcely be imagined that the visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales to Ireland would be fraught with any event of interest for the musical world; but we cannot allow such an important incident as the conferring of a Mus. Doc. degree upon the Princess by the University of Dublin, to pass without a word of sincere congratulation both to the givers and receiver of this distinction. Of course it was not to be expected that the illustrious lady who accepts this honour should "satisfy the Examiners" in the usual manner, as to her fitness to be created a Doctor of Music. The words honoris causa prefixed to the title sufficiently prove that the intention was to obtain the stamp of Royalty for the action of admitting women to University degrees in music; and if the act can thus be made, in the slightest degree, an agent in promoting harmony between the two countries, one more instance will be added of its powerful and benign influence.

The recognition of the works of English musicians in Germany is happily an event no longer to be chronicled as exceptional; but the introduction of a Symphony by a British composer in Paris should not be passed over without special mention, particularly as, with the exception of Sir Arthur Sullivan's Overture "In Memoriam," it is the first orchestral work of English origin that has ever been heard in the French capital. Mr. Cowen's "Scandinavian Symphony," which was chosen to represent the genius of our native artists, is in every respect admirably adapted for the purpose; and its reception at the Cirque d'Hiver, under the conductorship of M. Godard, was most cordial, in spite of the scant justice done to its great merits by the orchestra.

DRURY LANE THEATRE.

MR. CARL ROSA commenced his Opera season at this establishment on Easter Monday; but up to the night of the production of Mr. Goring Thomas's "Nadeshda" (the 16th ult.), only well known operas were given, "Maritana," "Carmen," "Faust," "Lucia," "The Bohemian Girl," and "Il Trovatore" being tolerably safe attractions during the holiday time. The excellent manner in which all these works were placed upon the stage, and received by the large audiences assembled on each occasion, strengthens our belief that English Opera-or at least Opera in the language of our country-has now taken so firm a hold of the sympathies of the people as to preclude the possibility of its being again banished from its natural home. Little need be said concerning the rendering of the works named by the principal members of Mr. Rosa's company; but a good word is due to Madame Georgina Burns for her excellent singing in the arduous part of Lucia, and to Mr. Barton McGuckin for his uniformly fine assumption, histrionically and vocally, of Don Fose, in "Carmen," both artists evidencing the result, not only of continuous earnest study, but of widened experience in operatic requirements since they were last heard in London.

As we have said, the Russian Opera, "Nadeshda," composed by Mr. Goring Thomas expressly for this company, was produced on the 16th ult., with a success as decisive

Julian Sturgis, is excellently laid out for musical setting; and although in no part rising to the level of more than what may be termed "stage poetry," the versification what hay be cented stage poetry, the varied situa-tions of the drama. The plot may be thus briefly described. The scene is laid near Moscow, and the Opera opens with a beautiful picture of rustic summer life, when a number of serfs are rejoicing that the Princess Natalia has given up her estate to her son Voldemar, and hoping that he will be more merciful than his mother. Ostap, a serf, is deeply in love with Nadeshda, a beautiful young girl, also a serf; but she, feeling that she has not yet seen the one she can love, refuses him. Voldemar arrives, bringing with him his brother Ivan. young men fall in love with Nadeshda, and she recognises in Voldemar the ideal of her dreams. Voldemar, on coming to his estate, promises Ivan that he will bestow upon him any gift that he may ask for on the morrow. Ivan, therefore, claims the serf Nadeshda. Voldemar makes the girl free, and declares that she is not his to give; the brothers quarrel, and Ivan is driven from the castle. The Princess, having been informed by Ivan that Voldemar loves a serf, goes to Nadeshda's cottage, orders the girl to be brought out and condemns her to be flogged. Ostap flies for help to Voldemar, who arrives in time to save her, and defying his mother, declares that he will at once marry Nadeshda. Ivan tries to persuade the girl to fly with him, but Ostap comes between them, stabs Ivan, and then kills himself. As the marriage is about to take place, the Princess requests to speak alone with Nadeshda, when she shows her a paper given her by the Empress, which will make any one whose name is inserted a beggar and an exile. save Voldemar, Nadeshda begs her own name to be written in, and promises that she will see her lover no more. Voldemar prevents this, and just as the Princess declares them to be both beggars, the dying Ivan is brought in; he confesses all, and the Princess, overwhelmed with grief and remorse, tears up the paper, and begs forgiveness from the lovers. In the treatment of this story Mr. Sturgis has evidently found it difficult to steer clear of the conventional libretti so justly held up to ridicule in the present day, for we have the well-known "happy peasantry"-happy, as a rule, although they are serfs-the tenor lover; the villain-who dispels any doubt as to his character in the early part of the Opera by the suggestive aside speech, "Have I a knife and strong right hand"and the suffering heroine; but the principal personages are in themselves so interesting, and the choral portions so skilfully woven in with the progress of the narrative that nothing seems to be introduced for abstract "effect," even an elaborate ballet, in which a story is told by the choir, and cleverly illustrated by the dancers, creating no feeling of patchiness. Opinions can scarcely be divided as to the superiority of Mr. Thomas's music over that of his first Opera, "Esmeralda." It is so much the fashion in criticising modern lyrical works to name the various composers who have influenced an aspirant for operatic honours-as if it were not an admitted fact that even the greatest creative artists are, and always have been, so "influenced"—that our silence on certain phrases in "Nadeshda," which remind us of the works of other writers, might be misconstrued were we not at once to declare that unless it becomes obvious that a young composer is a servile imitator of those who have already proved their claim to distinction, we consider that such occasional reminiscences detract not from the value of his work. Fully admitting, then, the freshness, the general melodiousness, and more especially the dramatic colouring of the music of "Nadeshda," we may at once dispose of any objections to the Opera as a pure work of art by saying that many of those important sections of the story which seem to demand grandly developed movements are too fragmentary to sustain the musical interest; and that, as a rule, masterly as is the orchestration throughout, it often lacks that contrast which is the striking merit of the works of the great operatic masters. On the other hand, we cannot speak too highly of the tenderness with which all the love passages are touched, the varied dramatic feeling evidenced in very many of the choral pieces, or the thoroughly Russian character stamped upon the whole of the music where local colour is attempted. The "Prelude" (for Overtures appear to be works of the past) contains four melodious themes, afterwards heard in the Opera, charmingly scored, and effectively indicating the character of the music which follows. This was enthusiastically re-demanded. In the first act, after some highly dramatic choral effects, and a gloomy solo from the serf Ostap, we have a graceful song for Nadeshda, "O river, dear river," the dreamy construction of which, although in sympathy with the nature of the heroine, prevented its creating the impression demanded by its abstract musical merits. The first piece which arrests the attention in the second act is the love duet for Nadeshda and Voldemar, "Do not fear me," which may be cited as one of the most spontaneous and artistically-written numbers of the Opera. The ballet, already referred to, stands quite apart from those conventional displays for the principal dancers too often thrust into operas seemingly for the purpose of giving these expensive members of the company something to do. The introduction of old Russian dances adds much interest to the scene, and the choral and instrumental effects are in happy sympathy with the situation. Nadeshda's air, "As when the snow-drift" (encored), a quartet for Nadeshda, the brothers, and Ostap (with chorus), and Ivan's bold song, "Our sires were stout and brave," are the other important pieces in this act, the quartet especially being worthy of warm commendation. The third act is introduced by a Prelude containing the theme of a song for Voldemar, which was replaced in performance by another, and very inferior one. Either, therefore, this song should be restored, or the Prelude omitted. Another love duet occurs in this act, excellent in its way, but scarcely equal to the former one. The Princess's song, "Olga, the glory of our race," derives much of its effect from the occasional use of three-bar and five-bar phrases; and some excellent dramatic music for the principal characters terminates the act, without, however, including what may be truly termed a well-planned finale. An excellently written chorus, with some melodious figures in the orchestral accompaniments, commences the last act, and this is followed by a religious strain, sung by the choir inside the chapel to which Voldemar is about to lead Nadeshda. There are some extremely effective points in the agitated scene after the interruption of the points in the agitated scene after the interruption of the marriage ceremony by the Princess; and the conclusion of the Opera, although somewhat hurried, affords a good opportunity for a bold choral climax on the moral text "So shall the good prevail." For a first night the rendering of the work was exceptionally good. The singing of Madame Valleria, as Nadeshda, was artistic and refined throughout, and her acting (notwithstanding a slight accident to her knee, for which an apology was circulated in the house) everything that could be desired. Mr. Barton McGuckin sang the whole of the tenor music with admirable effect, his portion of the love duet in the second act being exceedingly well rendered. The Princess does not appear until the third act; but her part is important, and Miss Josephine Yorke made the most of it. Mr. Leslie Crotty, as Ivan, was thoroughly efficient, and Mr. Burgon was as good a baritone villain as the music given to the serf Ostap would allow him to be. The scenery was excellent, and the practised hand of Mr. Augustus Harris was shown in the minutest detail of the stage-management. Every member of the chorus sang and acted as if conscious of being an item—however unimportant-of the story; and we need scarcely add that the general effect of the Opera was thus very materially enhanced. The work was conducted with his usual care and intelligence by Mr. Randegger; and the band, although occasionally somewhat unduly prominent, was generally most satisfactory. At the final fall of the curtain, the composer (who had also been compelled to appear between the acts), Mr. Carl Rosa, Mr. Augustus Harris, the author of the libretto, and all the principal vocalists were summoned on the stage, and most enthusiastically applauded.

A record of the performances of the past month would be incomplete were we to omit noticing the excellent rendering of Beethoven's "Fidelio," at a matinée, Madame Marie Roze, Mr. McGuckin, Mr. C. Lyall, and Mr. Snazelle proving themselves thoroughly efficient representatives of the principal characters in this too rarely heard masterpiece.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

THE performance of "Elijah," on March 27, brought the third season of this Society to a brilliant conclusion. As a matter of course, St. James's Hall was crowded in every part, for Mendelssohn's Oratorio is continually increasing in popularity, and equally, of course, the performance was characterised by perfect smoothness, the whole of the executants in all probability knowing their work by heart. Rarely has Mr. Santley rendered the part of the Prophet more magnificently, his voice being in perfect order. Miss Anna Williams, Madame Patey, and Mr. Maas were also in full possession of their resources. Madame Kate Baxter, a young contralto, gave an artistic rendering of the air "Woe unto them." Glancing backwards at the season, it is only fair to give the committee of the Society credit for having been the first to introduce "The Rose of Sharon" to a London audience, and also for the revivals of Berlioz's "L'Enfance du Christ" and Handel's "Belshazzar." We have called attention to what was lacking in the conduct of the undertaking, and need not enter further into the subject. It is for those who hold the reins to show by amendment in the future that they appreciate just, and at the same time kindly, criticism.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

SATURDAY, March 28, was a day lying midway between two anniversaries, those of Beethoven's death on the 26th and of Haydn's birth on the 3rst, or, perhaps, to be more correct, we should say the 1st of April. The Crystal Palace programme on that Saturday was, however, entirely devoted to the works of the Bonn master. If only a little corner had been given to the "father of the symphony" it would have served to remind musicians of the rock on which Beethoven built his eight symphonies, and the greater part of the ninth. If anniversaries are to be observed, why should one taken and the other left? The programme included the "Leonora" Overtures Nos. 1 and 3. The late G. Nottebohm proved, however, that the so-called first was written last, and that No. 3 was really the second of the series. It is, perhaps, not generally known that when the opera "Fidelio," produced in 1805, was revived in 1814, Beethoven began sketching out a fourth "Leonora" Overture, was not carried out, and the composer wrote instead the well-known Overture in E. An interesting selection from "Fidelio" and the Choral Symphony completed the programme. The solo vocalists were Miss A. Marriott, Mr. Barton McGuckin, and Mr. F. King. The rendering of the three instrumental movements of the Symphony, under Mr. Manns's direction, was excellent, but in the second part the chorus was not all that could be desired.

On the 4th ult., Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" was given, and the viola solo part was effectively rendered by Mr. Krause, This picturesque work had full justice done to it by Mr. Manns and his band, though in the Finale the effect was somewhat marred by the sounds which proceeded from the coulisse quartet. Madame Jessy Morrison played Weber's Concertstück, but for its due effect this showy piece demands more force and fire than the pianist seems to possess; she afterwards gave solos by Liszt and Raff. Wagner's "Waldweben" from "Siegfried," and the Festival Procession from Goldmark's opera "The Queen of Sheba" completed the instrumental portion of the programme. Mr. E. Lloyd was the vocalist.

On the following Saturday there was nothing of special moment. M. A. Fischer displayed good bowing and good execution in a cleverly written Concerto for violoncello (No. 1 in A) by Saint-Saëns. Madame Hughes-Paltzer made a favourable début, singing songs by Gound and Denza. The instrumental pieces were Meyerbeer's fine Overture "Struensee," Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, and a "Bacchanal" by Rubinstein, from his grand ballet "The Vine."

On the 18th ult., Berlioz's "Te Deum" for three choirs, orchestra, and organ, was given for the first time in England. Mr. Manne's name is indelibly associated with the revival of the French composer's music: two years ago he produced the famous "Messe des Morts," and now he has given us the opportunity—and let us hope not the last-of hearing Berlioz's "grandest creation." The first by nervousness, and only created a moderately favourable number, "Te Deum laudamus," is not very striking: it is treated fugally, but, as readers of the "Mémoires" are well aware, Berlioz never seriously applied himself to the study of counterpoint, canon, and fugue, and though he was not altogether ignorant of the severer forms of musical art, they proved hindrances rather than helps to his fancy. The "Tibi omnes" is a remarkable movement; some of the verses are sung by women's voices alone, some by men's, and when at the words "Pleni sunt coeli" the three choirs combine, accompanied by full orchestra, the effect is most startling. The "Dignare Domine" is solemn and dignified. The "Christe, Rex Gloriæ" is admirable from beginning to end; it is a genuine piece of sacred music, skilfully constructed, yet sober and stately. The "Te Ergo Quæsumus," for tenor solo, contains some charming phrases, though it possesses no special attraction. At the close the voices enter unaccompanied and pp to the words "Fiat, super nos misericordia," and closing phrase stands in vivid contrast to the " Judex Crederis," with its massive choral writing and its overpowering orchestral and organ effects. Berlioz regarded this as one of his grandest efforts, and we think that all who heard it at the Palace will be disposed to agree with him. It is not possible to describe in words the extraordinary impression made by this daring tone-picture; of its kind it is unique, and never did "the flame of genius" burn brighter in Berlioz's brain than when he penned this last number of the "Te Deum." We say "last number" although it was followed by a March. According to Dr. Richard Pohl's account, in his recently published "Hector Berlioz, Studien und Erinnerungen," the "Te Deum" and "March" were only to form episodes in a prodigious dramatic work to be entitled "The Return of the First Consul from his Italian Campaign." What was to follow the March we know not, for Berlioz never completed his scheme; but although the March is published with the Te Deum, and, in its way, is interesting, we cannot but regard it as an anti-climax.

Mr. Manns's orchestra was largely augmented for the occasion, and in addition to the Crystal Palace choir, divided into two parts, there was a choir of boys. It was impossible to carry out the composer's wishes with regard to the number of performers, or to arrange them exactly as he desired; but chorus and orchestra were well proportioned, and we have nothing but unqualified praise for the performance. The tenor solo was sung by Mr. Harper Kearton, and Mr. A. J. Eyre presided at the organ.

The Concerts concluded for the season on the 25th ult. with Mr. Manns's Benefit Concert. The programme in-cluded Schubert's Unfinished Symphony in B minor and the "Verwandlungs-Musik" and closing scene from the first act of "Parsifal" (first time at the Crystal Palace). Mdlle. Clotilde Kleeberg gave Mozart's D minor Concerto, and Mr. John Dunn played one of Ernst's violin pieces. The vocalists were Mdlle. Pauline Cramer and Messrs. Lloyd and Foli.

MONDAY AND SATURDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

A FEW remarks concerning the two final Concerts on March 28 and 30 are necessary, in order to render the record of the 27th season complete. As usual on these farewell occasions, a large number of instrumental artists appeared, the programmes being chiefly made up of solos. On the Saturday, however, the scheme included Haydn's concise Quartet in G, Op. 17, No. 5, and Schubert's Quintet in A, Op. 114, containing the variations on "Die Forelle." Signor Bottesini, as usual, created great excitement by his marvellous rendering of the Andante and Rondo from his Concerto in F sharp minor, and finally had to yield to the stormy demand for an encore. Mdlle. Kleeberg gave an interpretation, at once highly finished and expressive, of Chopin's Fantasia in F minor, and fully confirmed her right to be considered the most acceptable of pianists who have recently appeared. Finally, Herr Joachim played Nos. 4, 20, and 21 of Brahms's Hungarian Dances, not the most popular of the series, but sufficiently clever and piquant to enable him to produce his customary effect The Misses Henrietta and Gertrude Nunn, who sang duets by Marcello and Handel, appeared to be oppressed impression.

The forty-first and concluding Concert resolved itself into a series of leave takings between the audience and each performer individually. Mdlle. Kleeberg was the first to appear, her farewell piece being Chopin's Ballade in G minor, in which she was encored. Signor Piatti intro-duced a Bergamasco of his own composition. The Bergamasco is a dance resembling a Saltarello, having its origin at Bergamo, of which place Signor Piatti is a native. Signor Bottesini was also heard in pieces from his own pen, namely, an Elegia and a Tarantella, the last being a wonderful piece of display. Miss Zimmermann gave a quiet and unobtrusive rendering of three trifles by Schumann, and a similar number of Brahms's Hungarian Dances, played, of course, by Herr Joachim, brought the lengthy programme, in which Schumann's Quartet in A minor, Op. 41, No. 1, was included, to an end. Mr. Santley, who was in excellent voice, contributed songs by Handel, Schumann, and Gounod. It is satisfactory to know that Mr. Arthur Chappell's enterprise was never more firmly established in public favour than at present. If he could see his way to give a little more recognition to English composers, who are now taking their proper position every-where else, he would increase the debt of gratitude which music lovers owe to him.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

WHATEVER may be said of the neglect of modern English composers by this Society, there can be no doubt that in its recognition of Antonin Dvorák-one of the greatest living creative artists-the confidence of all those who wavered in their allegiance to our time-honoured institution has been thoroughly restored. True it is that the great Bohemian composer had made his mark in this country before the Philharmonic offered him the hand of welcome; but no sooner had he gained the sympathy of the English public than he was invited by the Directors to conduct his own works at one of the Concerts, was elected a member of the Society, and this season was commissioned to compose a Symphony, the triumphant success of which, on the 22nd ult., we have now the gratification to record. It would be absurd to suppose that an exhaustive criticism can be written upon a work of such importance after a single hearing, but the inventive power evidenced throughout the Symphony, the artistically developed design of each movement, the varied colouring of the orchestration, and the rhythmic charm of the themes cannot fail so thoroughly to impress the listener as to create a longing for a more intimate acquaintance with the score, so that the many beauties, revealed but for a moment in performance, can be lingered over as we would carefully study, at our leisure, the minutest points of a great picture. The Symphony, in D minor, opens with an Allegro maestoso, commencing with a marked theme on a tonic pedal. The second subject is extremely melodious and striking, and the various episodes which occur-all seeming to grow naturally from a well conceived plan-keep the interest alive to the conclusion of a movement remarkable alike for original thought and exquisite workmanship. In the Andante we have four subjects, all of which, perfectly lovely in themselves, are aided in effect by truly sympathetic instrumentation, and most skilfully developed. The Scherzo is instinct with those special rhythmic effects in which the composer ever delights; and the Trio, almost crowded with attractive themes, contains some excellent imitative points, in the return to the Scherzo many new features being introduced. The Finale is extremely fresh, skilfully developed, and orchestrated with a boldness which shows mastery over all the resources of the instruments tempered with matured judgment. Sclavonic in character, this Symphony may truly be looked upon as a representative national work; and the careful manner in which it was played, the warm applause with which it was greeted, and the ovation accorded to its composer (who conducted) must have strengthened his regard for a country where both artistically and personally he has been so tho-roughly appreciated. The remainder of the Concert demands but little notice-Madame Kleeberg played Weber's "Concertstück" with good effect; the Overtures to "Faust" (Spohr), "Leonora," No. 1 (Beethoven), and "Don Giovanni " (Mozart) were the orchestral pieces; and the vocalists were Mr. E. Lloyd and Miss Etherington, who sang the duet from Sullivan's "Kenilworth," "How sweet the monlight sleeps," Mr. Lloyd also giving in admirable style the Prize Song from "Die Meistersinger." Sir Arthur Sullivan was an excellent Conductor.

SEÑOR SARASATE'S CONCERTS.

THE crowded state of St. James's Hall on Saturday afternoon, the 18th ult., notwithstanding potent musical attractions elsewhere, proved that Señor Sarasate has not lost his hold on the affections of the public. While ordinary concert-goers regard him with admiration, apparently, unqualified musicians cannot shut their eyes to certain matters which distinctly lower him, judged as an artist. The Spanish violinist deserves hearty thanks for the series of Orchestral Concerts he gives annually in London; but unfortunately, while he interprets in a masterly way the greatest works written for his instrument, he condescends in the same programmes to seek the applause of the vulgar by performing feats more allied to gymnastics than art. A conspicuous instance of this occurred at his first Concert this season. The principal solo work in the programme was Max Bruch's second Concerto in D minor, Op. 34. This is by no means a masterpiece. The long slow movement with which it opens is unquestionably heavy and tedious; but at any rate the work is classical music in form and purpose, and the exquisite beauty of tone and marvellous finish of the player deserved, as they received, the heartiest tributes of admiration. Unfortunately, Señor Sarasate spoiled this good impression, at any rate in the estimation of the judicious, by introducing an example of what may be termed farmyard music, written by himself. This rubbish was of course loudly applauded. If the player had stood on his head during the piece the cheering would no doubt have been greater still. The orchestra, under Mr. W. G. Cusins, gave a fair rendering of Haydn's bright little Symphony generally known as "The Bear," and other smaller items.

THE LATE MADAME SAINTON DOLBY'S ACADEMY.

An In Memoriam performance generally suggests a feeling of solemnity, and this may deepen into sadness when the one in whose honour it is held has only recently been removed from the sphere of active life and work. No better proof of the esteem in which the late Madame Sainton Dolby was held could have been desired than the general interest taken in the Concert given in the Princes Hall, on the 24th ult. That the eminent contralto was almost idolised by her pupils, those who were associated in the work of her Academy had constant means of judging, and offers of assistance from many former students were received as soon as the announcements respecting the Concert were made public. Musically, the interest of the erformance centred in the production of a new cantata by Madame Sainton, which received the finishing touches only a few days before her death. She had also indicated by whom the solo parts were to be taken, and as a matter of course her wishes were faithfully carried out. work is entitled "Florimel," and is written for female voices only. The libretto, by Mr. J. A. Blaikie, is a simple tale of pastoral life mingled with fairy lore, suggested at any rate, if not directly adapted, from Spenser. The Cantata will certainly prove a welcome addition to the number of high class works for female voices, for which a strong demand is now arising. The music is not only melodious, but is dis-tinguished by a vein of fancifulness, and here and there a touch of quaintness admirably in keeping with the subject. It is also extremely well written, some portions—notably a chorus, "O follow, follow," showing musicianship of no mean order. The performance, under M. Sainton, could scarcely have been better. The principal solo parts were taken by Miss Fanny Moody, a young soprano gifted with a singularly sympathetic voice, and Miss Amy Foster, who possesses a rich mezzo-soprano organ, the training of which appears to be complete. Nothing could have been more pleasing than the rendering of the choruses, the phrasing and observation of the nuances being absolutely | Society.

without flaw. A considerable portion of the rest of the Concert consisted of Madame Sainton's songs, by express desire of the students. Among these was a graceful air, "Lady love, tender dove," from an unpublished Cantata, "Thalassa," which Mr. Edward Lloyd had kindly volunteered to sing, and an expressive sacred song, "A voice from Heaven," tastefully rendered by Miss Hilda Coward. The most successful efforts of the students were Miss Hyde's rendering of "Bel Raggio" and Miss Willis's remarkably finished delivery of "Non più mesta." We must not omit to mention the capital performance of Maurer's Concertante for four violins, by Miss Winifred Robinson, Miss Gates, Miss Cheetham, and Miss Cocks, pupils, we believe, of M. Sainton, at the Royal Academy of Music. There was a very large and aristocratic audience.

BOROUGH OF HACKNEY CHORAL ASSOCIATION.

THE final Concert of this Society for the present season, on the 20th ult., was attended not only by the subscribers and public, but by a considerable number of eminent musicians. This unwonted gathering was due to the nature of the programme, and the interest attaching to individual items. There is no longer any rashness in giving a high class Concert entirely of English music, and every year renders a scheme of this kind more easy of fulfilment, thanks to the successes our young composers are winning in every department of their art. If the intention had been to exhibit rising native talent in the strongest possible light, some other names would have been included in the programme, but even as it stood the scheme was fairly representative. Two of the items were written expressly for the occasion, the most important being a Choral Ode entitled "Freedom," by Mr. Ebenezer Prout. This is a setting of a poem by the Rev. P. T. Forsyth, the nature of which may be gathered from the author's own description:—"It is," he says, "a song of English freedom, of a thing at once gay and solemn, earthly and unearthly. It owes, perhaps, as much to women as to men. It is composite, as our race is-Celtic in its untamed passion, Teutonic in its controlled and ordered principle. It is blended of the wild and mystic hills and the conquered fierceness of the sea. It is less a proud possession than a mighty trust, and we are therein the stewards of the world. And to remain a blessing it must rest for ever upon the Rock Eternal of Duty and Self-control." This truly national theme is illustrated in verses of much spirit, and almost brilliancy of idea. Mr. Prout's music is in every way suitable to his text. The work opens with a solemn march-like baritone solo leading to a chorus in the same vein. The tenors, representing Celts, then have a unison chorus, which is followed by one for basses, who are supposed to be Teutons. Up to this point the style is rugged and, if the term may pass, self assertive, but when the female voices take up the parable it becomes somewhat more flowing and tuneful. The concluding chorus, however, is immensely broad and energetic, working up to a pompous peroration. The Ode is richly scored, but even without orchestra it would probably prove extremely effective, its thoroughly English character being perhaps its strongest point. Favourable mention must also be made of a very elegant setting, for soprano voice, of Tennyson's verses "Sweet and low," by Mr. John E. West. The first part was occupied by Mr. F. H. Cowen's romantic and beautiful Cantata "St. Ursula," a work that ought to take its place among the best things of its kind, for it only needs familiarity to command acceptance. No better example of English command acceptance. No better cample of instrumental music could have been selected than Mr. Mackenzie's orchestral ballad "La belle Dame sans Merci." There were various other items which space will not permit us to mention. The performance of every piece left very little to desire. As usual, the choir sang splendidly, Miss Annie Marriott gave a highly dramatic rendering of the principal rôle in "St. Ursula," and almost equal satisfaction was given by the other soloists, Miss Hope Glenn, Mr. J. W. Turner, and Mr. Musgrove Tufnail. We are glad to learn that the past season has been one of the most successful ever experienced by the

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

The artistic portion of the past season's work may now be said to be practically concluded, and the all important question of finance absorbs the undivided attention of the societies whose appearances have been regularly recorded in these columns. It is not anticipated that the accounts will be of a very glowing nature, but if the effects of commercial depression can be tided over without serious deficiencies, the future should make amends for pecuniary losses which may have been sustained.

The Philharmonic Society concluded its 1884-5 programme on March 24 with a Concert, in which the chief feature was Dvorák's "Stabat Mater." This performance had been looked forward to in musical circles with considerable interest, and the hearing of the "Stabat Mater" served to confirm the fact that Dvorák's position has been obtained not only by clever originality in the manipulation of an orchestra, but by his powerful grasp and intrinsic ability in the treatment of great subjects. Reverence and sublimity are the striking characteristics of his "Stabat Mater," and conscientiously adhering throughout to the broad text, avoiding all opportunities of making points for the mere sake of pleasing the ear, the effect of the work in its entirety is exceedingly impressive. Its rendering was commendable in every respect. The principals—Miss Anna Williams, Madame Patey, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Bridson—gave, as might be expected, artistic expression to the solos, whilst the choir and band overcame the difficulties which Dvorák's scoring presents with intelligence and ability.

The very name of Herr Richter is sufficient to kindle the enthusiasm of everyone possessing the faintest interest in the presentation of high-class orchestral music, and in selecting Liverpool for the opening of his provincial tour, he was rewarded by a large and appreciative audience. This initial Concert, which took place at the Philharmonic Hall, on Tuesday, the 21st ult., was almost entirely devoted to examples of the great Bayreuth composer, and this is not only readily accounted for, but specially welcome in view of Herr Richter's unusually close and intimate connection with Wagner and the development of his theories. The personality of such a conductor is in itself a study, and under his bâton, not only are such excerpts as the Vorspiel to "Parsifal," the introduction and final scene from "Tristan australia" and even the well-worn, but always impressive, Overture to "Tannhauser," vivified by the infusion of light and shade, but they absolutely, under such an influence, assume a new aspect in regard to the intentions of the composer. The only remaining item of importance in the programme was Beethoven's "Tragic" Symphony, No. 5, in C minor, and its rendering evidenced the same keen insight of the work and powerful command of his forces which constitute Herr Richter's great characteristics. Miss Lena Little, the vocalist, sang acceptably selections from Gluck and Mozart.

Mr. John Ross, the musical director of the Royal Alexandra Theatre, was the recipient, on Wednesday, the 15th ult., of a friendly address from a number of his associates and well-wishers—a graceful means of testifying to the esteem and regard in which Mr. Ross is universally held in musical circles

During the past month comparatively little music has been publicly perfurmed in Manchester, and the few Concerts that have been given have served to wind up their respective series; and, almost absolutely, to conclude our respective series; and, almost absolutely, to conclude our neeason. The last Pianoforte Recital, on Monday, the 6th ult., by Mr. Hallé, at which an interesting selection was made from the works of Scarlatti, Clementi, Handel, Schubert, Mendelssohn, and Hiller, attracted a large audience, and proved what a source of interest lies in the newly instituted afternoon performances. A fortnight later the Gentleman's Concerts terminated with a programme in which Schubert's "Trout" Quintet (ably rendered by Miss Houfer and Messrs, Risegari, Hunnerman, Smith, and Brazilier) and Schumann's Fantasiestücke, Op. 88, relieved the monotony of a programme mainly of pianoforte music. Miss Wilkinson exhibited a delicate touch in music by Chopin and Scarlatti; Miss Houfer and Mr. Hecht displayed higher qualities and greater experience in Saint-Saëns's Duet for two pianofortes upon a Beethoven theme, and the three pianists united their efforts in Bach's Concerto, which was given with accompaniment for stringed instruments.

At the last of the Working Men's Concerts, under Mr. De Jong's management, a crowded audience seemed to appreciate a plentiful assortment of ballads, interspersed with military band selections and some choral music.

Mr. Cross's Saturday Evening Entertainments at the Association Hall have throughout the winter been well attended, and, I hope, pecuniarily rewarded the spirit with which they were undertaken.

The suburban choral societies have concluded their labours, after exertions in spreading a knowledge of, and taste for, serious music, which must have a very powerful influence.

At the theatres we have had various operatic and semimusical companies, especially a D'Oyley Carte corps giving performances of the "Sorcerer" and other of Messrs. Gilbert and Sullivan's popular works.

Reviewing the season, as a whole, the increase in Mr. Halle's staff of instrumentalists, while enabling the per-formance of many of Wagner's most striking pieces of orchestration, was far more importantly utilised in enhancing the effect of the great symphonies, which have been excellently given; but, if I may venture to express a very general feeling with respect to Mr. Halle's programmes, I should advise the introduction of novelties upon a more liberal and general plan. Indebted to Mr. Hallé for increased excellence of performance, the subscribers do not forget that a great series of Concerts firmly established in a provincial city practically creates a monopoly which has its duties and responsibilities as well as its unquestionable privileges. There are evidences of increased competition, even in orchestral performance - that last want in the musical arrangements of our country townsand it is plain that, combined with loyalty to an old undertaking, there is a determination to have novelty as well as recognised merit. The feeling which, many years ago, backed Mr. Hallé, and facilitated the establishment of his orchestral Concerts, has naturally grown; and is leading to the healthy encouragement of all really meritorious

A similar looking back upon the revolution quietly working at the Concert Hall confirms the conviction, long since arrived at by the public—but apparently unfelt by the directors of the Gentlemen's Concerts-that undertakings upon the largest scale appeal to audiences that cannot be accommodated in a room that sufficed for the more exclusive gatherings of thirty or forty years back. A very useful future might be devised for a long-established institution, but it must be based upon a clear insight into the changed condition of the surroundings. If the directors of the Concert Hall affairs will further develop their scheme of afternoon gatherings, and will give such able performances of chamber music as might easily and cheaply be arranged in Manchester, they will show that they understand the problem which it is their duty to study. The Gentlemen's Concerts have been brought to the very verge of ruin by a careless persistence in worn-out schemes, and by an obstinate adherence to obsolete ideas. During the past season evidences of new life have been given; some promising and others not quite healthy. May the plans for next winter be well-considered, liberal, progressive, and, above all, not cliquey.

In and around Manchester there has been an increasing energy in the smaller societies and musical undertakings, and no better evidence could be asked for of the spread of a love of music and of a growing skill in its performance. The efforts which some well known gentlemen made, at the commencement of the winter, to promote a culture of instrumental music resembling that wonderful increase of vocal ability which has taken place during the last few years have, I understand, been so successful as to warrant a very material enlargement of their operations. Next October there will, I believe, be a most comprehensive scheme of classes for instruction, inaugurated

motion of Orchestral Playing.

The two undertakings which still demand attention not only took place later in the month than the doings I have noticed, but stood a little apart from the regular work of the season. On Wednesday, the 22nd ult, the Vocal Society, after an interregnum of about two years, again appeared in public, under the direction of Mr. H. Watson, Mus. Bac., who succeeds the late Mr. H. Wilson as manager of the Society. The choral work was marked by considerable precision and taste, the best effort being Leslie's madrigal "Charm me asleep." The following evening the Free Trade Hall was well filled to welcome Herr Richter, whose manager had made wiser preliminary arrangements than heretofore. Owing to some difficulty in securing the best instrumentalists, the performance of the band certainly was not quite what had been expected. But much of the difficulty of the wood wind was caused by Wagner's peculiar mode of scoring. The programme concluded with Beethoven's Symphony in A.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM. (FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

EASTERTIDE in Birmingham this year has proved more than usually barren of musical interest. Good Friday was celebrated by special services in some of the churches, and some secular vocalisation at Aston Grounds, where Mr. Vernon Rigby was the bright particular star; but neither Passion week nor Easter week was consecrated by any public performance of greater musical importance than a comic opera. At the Church of St. Augustine Mr. Gaul's Passion Music was performed on Good Friday with orchestral accompaniments, and the Unitarian Church of the Messiah gave selections on the same day from Haydn's Passion Music. On Easter, Sunday, the most noteworthy musical celebration was a performance of Mozart's Second Mass, with orchestral accompaniment, at the Oratory.

The fourth and last of Mr. Stockley's Orchestral Concerts, which took place on the 16th ult., was, in some respects, the most interesting and enjoyable of the series, owing not only to the large proportion of meritorious novelties comprised in the programme, but also, and mainly, to the presence of composers of note hitherto known here only by name, of whom two, Mr. Praeger and Herr Martin Roeder, made their bows to the public from the orchestra. The Prélude Symphonique in D minor of the first-named composer, originally produced at the Crystal Palace some five years ago, was, next to the rarely-heard Beethoven Symphony, No. 8, the orchestral feature of the evening. Mr. Praeger, though present in the Hall, wisely entrusted the direction of the work to Mr. Stockley, whose intimate relations with the band enabled him to insure a well nigh faultless performance. The Prélude, it will be remembered, aspires to suggest in musical forms some of the psychological problems and characteristics of Byron's "Manfred," and is therefore to some extent in the nature of Programme music; but whatever may be thought of the composer's success in depicting the mental conflict of Byron's gloomy protagonist, there can be no question as to the excellence of his work, regarded solely as abstract music, and not a little surprise was expressed by Birmingham musicians that so fine a composition should have been so long neglected. On this occasion, the delight of the audience found vent in loud and prolonged applause, followed by calls for the composer, who was ultimately brought on by Mr. Stockley to bow his acknowledgments. Herr Martin Roeder, the composer of the Russian Opera "Vera," who conducted a couple of excerpts from that picturesque and characteristic work, also met with a very flattering reception. ballet music, which constituted the first instalment, is a melodious and rather striking waltz, commencing in D major, and remarkable for its spirit, and strongly emphasised Russian colouring, to which a free use of the drum largely contributes. The following "Entracte" in C major, depicting the incidents of a Russian fair, including the passage of a bridal procession, which furnishes occasion for the introduction of the Russian song, "Kamarinskaja," is, like the previous excerpt, spirited and fantastic, though a praiseworthy manner of the duties of accompanist.

in parts somewhat noisy and cacophonous, as a result of the prodigal use of instruments of brass and percussion. third novelty was an overture, or initial number of a Suite in D minor, by Mr. Percy Godfrey, a young Worcestershire musician, a somewhat ambitious work for a maiden essay, but one evidencing a good deal of tasts, refinement, and scholarship, if not very striking originality. Certain obscurities were probably due to defects of performance, as the work had evidently been very imperfectly rehearsed. The final novelty of the Concert was a Morçeau fantastique, entitled "Phospho," by Mr. E. L. Hime, a sprightly and brightly scored piece of dance music, but wanting in character and originality. The remaining orchestral numbers were Sir Arthur Sullivan's noble "In Memoriam" Overture, produced at the Norwich Festival of 1866; Meyerbeer's" Coronation" March, and the Beethoven Symphony in F, incidentally alluded to, all of which were very creditably played under Mr. Stockley's direction. The vocalists were Madame Patey and Mr. Barrington Foote, the former of whom created quite a sensation by her powerful and impressive rendering of Beethoven's "Creation's Hymn." In Randegger's "Lullaby," to which Mr. Ould contributed the violoncello obbligato, the effect was momentarily impaired by a misunderstanding between Madame Patey and her accompanists, which involved a partial resumption of the song. Mr. Foote's contributions comprised airs from "Les vêpres Siciliennes" and "Maometto secondo."

In pursuance of the project which they initiated in March, Messrs. Rogers and Priestley gave a second invitation Concert of classical chamber music to their friends and connections on the 13th. The executants were the same as on the previous occasion—viz., Messrs. Ward and Abbott, as leaders of the string quartet; Mr. E. W. Priestley, second violin; Mr. A. J. Priestley, violoncello; and Mrs. Hale, pianoforte. Beethoven's String Quartet in B flat, No. 6, Op. 18, and that of Mr. Villiers Stanford, for pianoforte and strings, in F major, Op. 15, constituted the alpha and omega of the programme respectively, other works of interest being Mendelssohn's Sonata in B flat, Op. 45, for pianoforte and violoncello, and a "Rondeau Brillant" of Schubert, Op. 76, for violin and pianoforte. Mrs. Hale greatly charmed the audience by her finished and expressive playing of Thalberg's Barcarole in A minor, and Raff's

The final Concert of Dr. Swinnerton Heap's series of Classical Chamber Concerts was given at the Masonic Hall on Saturday, the 18th ult. The programme comprised Hall on Saturday, the 18th uit. The programme comprised a Quartet (in A minor, Op. 41, No. 1, strings) by Schumann, a violoncello solo, "Chante Elégiaque," by B. Tours, Beethoven's "Kreutzer" Sonata, a pianoforte solo, Prelude and Fugue in E minor, by Mendelssohn, and a Quartet in E flat, by A. C. Mackenzie. The artists were the same as on former occasions, Messrs. Carrodus, Speelman, Bernhardt, and Vieuxtemps being the strings, and Dr. Heap pianist. The performance throughout was admirable, and elicited enthusiastic expressions of approval. These Concerts will be resumed in the autumn.

On Monday, the 20th ult., a Pianoforte and Violin Recital was given at the Midland Institute by Miss Emily Walker Miss Lilian Dixon. The concerted numbers were Beethoven's Senata, Op. 30, No. 3, and part of Rubinstein's first Sonata for violin and piano. Miss Dixon played several violin solos—Ernst's "Elégie," a Romance by Carrodus, entitled "L'Adieu," an Allegretto grazioso, by Molique, Beethoven's Romance in G, and a selection from Brahms's Hungarian Dances, arranged by Joachim -in all of which the fair performer evinced considerable taste and skill, though scarcely sufficient power. Miss Walker's solos included Beethoven's Thirty-two variations in C minor, Mendelssohn's Prelude and Fugue in E minor, Rubinstein's Valse Caprice, and Mosz-kowski's Polonaise in D, besides several others well calculated to test the pianist's powers in every way.

order, combined with chasteness of style and refined feeling, but she appears to more advantage as executant than as composer. She also shared with Mrs. Hutchinson the vocal items of the programme and the applause which they so well merited. Mr. F. T. Cox acquitted himself in

ALTHOUGH there are not wanting indications that the musical season is rapidly waning, the month now brought to a close has been remarkable for several interesting events. First and foremost in point of importance, though coming last in order of date, was the visit to Leeds, on the 22nd ult., of Herr Richter and his famous band. This was his third engagement in connection with the provincial tour he and his followers are now making. The visit was generally regarded with much interest in musical circles of Leeds and Bradford, and it was matter for astonishment that when the performance came round the Victoria Hall contained many empty seats. That the influence of Wagner should largely pervade the Concert was but natural, and was accepted as if the matter had been a foregone conclusion. How far the spirit of the bard of Bayreuth met with acceptance is another question. The overture to "Tannhäuser," not only because it is more familiar, but because it is constructed on well understood lines, can always find sympathetic ears, but not so perhaps with the less transparent harmonies and hidden meanings of the instrumental music from "Tristan," "Parsifal," or the Walkürenritt music. Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 4, proved much more agreeable fare, and the contrast afforded by the fascinating Seventh Symphony of Beethoven was charming beyond measure. Further acquaintance with Herr Richter, and with the great tonepoems which threaten to revolutionise the art of music, would be welcomed by many who attended the Leeds Concert. It should be added that two songs were sung by Miss Lena Little, an accomplished contralto.

Following closely upon their artistic success in connection with the Handel Commemoration Festival, the Bradford Festival Choral Society gave a performance of "Elijah" in St. George's Hall, on March 27. The performance was in most respects a worthy example of the high state of efficiency to which this strong organisation has been brought. The band again proved the only excep-tion to the rule, and afforded another instance of the difficulty often experienced in Yorkshire of securing a really perfect body of instrumentalists. The principals were Miss Annie Albu, who, in oratorio, was new to a Bradford audience, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Seymour Jackson, and Mr. Bridson. Mr. Burton was the Conductor, and the Organist was Mr. J. H. Clough.
